A serious situation confronted the management. The warehouses were filled to overflowing, in the face of a steadily diminishing demand. Manifestly, there could be no justification for jeopardizing the assets of the stockholders by locking them up in unsalable goods. But these conditions did not arise overnight. If there had been close contact with the workers, they could have been discussed in advance and when the time came for action the workers would have been educated in some of the elementary facts of modern business, one of the most important of which is the slight degree of control over selling prices which can be exercised by producers. These are subject to world-wide influences, uncontrollable by any human foresight.

As a result of this education, the workers, through their representatives on the shop committees and on the board of directors, would be ready to consider the alternatives of reduced wages or reduction of working time. In any event, both from the standpoint of humanity and of sound business judgment, the first consideration should have been given to the human element in the organization.

The efficiency of an experienced working organization is an intangible asset, the value of which cannot be expressed in figures, but nonetheless it is one of the most valuable factors in an industrial organization. Therefore, even a partial dispersal of unemployment is a distinct loss.

It is said that after the passage of a reform bill by the British Parliament, which greatly extended the franchise, the Prime Minister said to an associate: "Now we must educate our masters." By sheer force of numbers, the workers in our democracy are now potentially our masters, and it is both the duty and the privilege of the representatives of capital and management to educate them in some of the elementary problems of trade and finance, and thus fit them to function intelligently as equal partners in our industries.

To an ultraconservative, this proposed radical advance in the science of human relations may seem to be visionary.

The philosopher, Kant, recognized the fact that the advocacy of his Categorical Imperative (which, after all, is only restatement in different words of the Golden Rule), as a rule of conduct, might seem to be a counsel of perfection. In this connection he said: "Let us live up to such a principle and we shall soon create an ideal community of rational beings; to create it, we need only to act as if we already belonged to it. We must apply the perfect law in the imperfect state. It is a hard ethic, you say; but only so can we cease to be beasts and begin to be gods."

In conclusion, whether or not democracy is a practicable form of government, is still an open question. It is being challenged today, not only in continental Europe, but even in England. If it is to survive, there can be no question but that we must face the fact that democracy is terribly dynamic. It is not an automatic system, which will run of itself by the mere machinery of administration. Perpetual motion is not attainable in social relations any more than in mechanics.

Lincoln was faced by a grave question. He said: "A house divided against itself cannot stand. I believe this Government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free."

We are confronted by a similar situation, and we need leaders who will face it with the same clear-eyed courage, taking as their slogan—"A house divided against itself cannot stand. This Nation cannot endure permanently politically democratic and industrially autocratic."

WILLIAM B. DICKSON.

DEPORTATION OF ALIEN CRIMINALS

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, upon the calendar is the bill (S. 2969) relating to the deportation of alien criminals. The bill was reported from the Committee on Immigration and is known as the "deportation bill." Recently the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, D. W. MacCormack, delivered a radio address which is of such merit as commands me to ask unanimous consent that it, together with a letter under date of August 15, 1935, addressed to me by the Commissioner, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, August 15, 1935.

Hon. GERALD P. NYE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR NYE: Thank you for your very kind note of August 13. I enclose copy of address you mention. Please use it or this letter as you wish.

The bills to which I refer (S. 2969 introduced by Senator COOLIDGE and H. R. 8163 introduced by Congressman KERR):

1. Strengthens the law with reference to criminals; makes it possible to deport for one crime involving moral turpitude without regard to length of residence; renders racketeers and gangsters convicted of carrying dangerous weapons subject to deportation; subjects the violator of State narcotic laws to deportation on the same terms as violators of Federal acts; makes the alien who smuggles other aliens into the country deportable—the present law enables the deportation of the alien who enters illegally but does not permit the deportation of the alien smuggler.

These are additional groups not deportable under existing law. The present mandatory deportation law referring to alien criminals remains in full force and effect.

2. Requires that recommendations of judges staying the deportation of criminals be reviewed and approved before becoming effective.

3. Abrogates preference in immigration to agriculturists. This provision has been abused and is certainly not needed under present conditions.

4. Authorizes supervisory officers in field to issue warrants of arrest and permits detention of aliens here illegally pending issuance of warrant. Due to lack of this authority 2,600 deportable aliens have escaped in the last year.

5. Permits registry of aliens who entered before July 1, 1924, and are not subject to deportation, thus putting them in the same category as aliens who entered prior to June 3, 1921, and who, under the present law, are permitted to register and eventually become citizens.

6. Permits visitors or students entitled to a nonquota or preference admission to change status without leaving country. This gives them nothing to which they are not entitled under present law but spares them a long and costly voyage to a foreign country.

7. Provides for limited discretion to stay deportation of aliens of good character who have not been convicted of crime and who have been in this country 10 years or have members of their immediate families here.

Under the present law any judge or magistrate can prevent the deportation of criminal aliens, but not even the President of the United States can avert the deportation of an alien who is not a criminal.

8. Provides for deduction from national quotas for aliens permitted to remain, register, or change status. This, in effect, reduces quotas.

This is primarily a deportation and not an immigration bill. It does not deal with immigration policy. It was drawn with a view to strengthening the administration of the law and to facilitate ridding the country of undesirable aliens while at the same time permitting a measure of humane discretion in dealing with aliens of good character.

The increase in deportations of undesirable aliens resulting from this bill will be at least two to three times the number of aliens of good character permitted to remain.

We have stayed deportation during the past 26 months in the cases of 2,600 aliens of good character but unless some remedial legislation is passed we will be obliged to proceed with their deportation.

If these people are deported they will leave behind them in the United States more than 7,000 members of their immediate families, including more than 5,000 wives and children, for the most part American citizens and also for the most part persons who will become public charges in the event of the deportation of the breadwinner.

As I stated in the radio address to which you have referred, I am not a sentimentalist, but I have an unconquerable faith in the humanity and the justice of our Congress and of our people, and I cannot bring myself to believe that they will permit this unjust and inhuman mass deportation to come to pass.

Very sincerely yours,

D. W. MACCORMACK,
Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization.

Radio address by Mr. D. W. MacCormack.

What is our alien problem today?

IMMIGRATION

It is not concerned with immigration which has dropped from over a million a year to between thirty and forty thousand. For several years past more persons of foreign birth have returned to their native lands than have come here as immigrants.

There is not the slightest likelihood—nor is there any demand—that this country let down the immigration bars.

THE ALLEGED ALIEN MENACE

Nor is there any reality in the efforts to paint the alien in this country as a menace to our form of government, to our jobs, and to our standards of living.

The figures so often cited are fantastic exaggerations. No scintilla of proof has ever or ever can be advanced in their support.

ALIENS IN THE UNITED STATES

They say there are from 6,000,000 to 20,000,000 aliens here.

The actual number is 4,922,000. About 1,500,000 of these have directly or through their parents applied for naturalization.

ALIENS SUBJECT TO DEPORTATION FOR ILLEGAL ENTRY

They say there are from 3,500,000 to 10,000,000 aliens here illegally and subject to deportation.

The actual number is probably less than 100,000.

The entire number who entered illegally or who, after a lapse of years, cannot prove their legal entry is believed to be less than 400,000.

DESERTING SEAMEN

They say that 1,000,000 alien seamen enter American ports annually and that 50 percent may remain illegally.

Less than 250,000 enter annually instead of a million. The net number remaining here in 1934 was less than 250 instead of half a million.

ILLEGAL ENTRIES OF MEXICANS

Another of these assertions is that the census figures show that 500,000 Mexicans entered illegally between 1920 and 1930. What they actually show is to the exact contrary. They indicate that in 1930 there were 289,000 fewer Mexicans in this country than had a legal right to be here.

MASS DEPORTATIONS

They say that if 6,000,000 aliens could be deported and their jobs given to Americans the unemployment problem would be solved; but what of the cotton and beef growers of Texas, the wheat farmers of Nebraska, the fruit growers of California, the shoemakers of Massachusetts, the shirt makers of New York, the steel workers of Pennsylvania, the coal miners of West Virginia, if they lost at one legislative stroke a twentieth of the American market, on which they must depend for any hope of prosperity?

What of the owners of real estate and the already prostrate building trades if 1 person out of every 20 who occupies a dwelling is deported? What of the American taxpayer, who, to add to his present burdens, would be called upon to support the millions of American citizen wives and children who would be left behind to become public charges?

Such statements excite strife and antagonism at a time when what we most need is a united people. They stir up racial prejudices, which have no place in this America of ours, and rouse expectations of unjust advantage which have no possibility of fulfillment.

THE REAL PROBLEM

These are false problems, lacking both substance and reality. We have, however, a real problem in the administration of the deportation laws.

They coddle the criminal while dealing with unbelievable severity with the alien of good character.

Under the present laws thousands of alien criminals who are a danger and a menace to our people are at large and cannot be deported.

On the other hand, there is no possibility of the exercise of humane discretion in the case of the alien of good character.

Any judge or magistrate can avert the deportation of a criminal alien, but not even the President of the United States has power to avert the deportation of an alien who is not a criminal.

Husbands are torn from their American-citizen wives and children. It is frequently necessary to deport the father to one country, the mother to another, and the children to a third, thus separating these unfortunate families beyond any possibility of reunion in this world.

Such laws are barbarous and un-American, unworthy of a great and humane Nation.

PROPOSED CORRECTIVE LEGISLATION (S. 2969, H. R. 8163)

Judge KERR, of North Carolina, in the House, and Senator COOLIDGE, of Massachusetts, in the Senate, have introduced bills to close up the loopholes in the present law through which the alien criminal escapes, to strengthen the hands of the Immigration Service in seizing and deporting the alien who enters illegally, and to prevent some of the incredibly cruel family separations which are inevitable under the present law.

DEPORTATIONS INEVITABLE IF CONGRESS FAILS TO ACT

Upon the success of their efforts depends the fate of 2,600 aliens of good character, whose deportation has been stayed in the past 2 years, and, infinitely more important, the fate of their families in this country. If the law is not changed these people must be deported. They will leave behind them more than 7,000 members of their immediate families, including over 5,000 wives and children, for the most part American citizens. I am not a sentimentalist, but I have an unconquerable faith in the humanity and the justice of our Congress and of our people and I cannot bring myself to believe that they will permit this unjust and inhuman mass deportation to come to pass.

BAN ON WAR CREDITS

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, in today's Washington Daily News appears an editorial entitled "Never Again." It cogently presents the view that unless we shall include as a part of any neutrality program adopted by this country a mandatory ban on all war credits to belligerent nations and on shipments of contraband in American bottoms, we are almost certain to be drawn into the current of any European war. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News, Aug. 22, 1935]

NEVER AGAIN

With Great Britain and others trying to line up the United States against Italy in the African-European war threat, Congress is failing in its duty to provide for the neutrality which we believe public opinion demands.

The World War record of bankruptcy and blood proves how easily the United States can drift into a foreign conflict, though the combined American public, President, and Congress oppose such entanglement and believe it impossible. Regardless of our peace desires today, we are in danger of being pulled into the next foreign war. If we ignore our experience, we are as foolish as the child who sticks his hand into the fire a second time.

The neutrality resolution passed by the Senate yesterday will not give us sufficient protection. The proposed House resolution is even less adequate.

The Senate ban on munitions sales and shipments to belligerents ignores the fact that the bulk of war trade is not direct munitions, but essential contraband such as oil, cotton, and foodstuffs. It also ignores the fact that the chief avenue of entanglement is through loans and credits making America an investor in the foreign war. The proposed House resolution would fix no mandatory ban or anything, even on munitions, but leave the entire policy discretionary with the President.

Here is the record proving the futility of that approach:

The absurdity of safeguarding neutrality by merely permitting the President to take such steps if he desires, after war begins, is shown by President Wilson's official reminder to Germany in 1915 that an American ban on Allied war trade would violate neutrality. Replying to Germany's request that we ban war shipments to the Allies, Wilson stated the well-established international law, as follows:

"This Government holds—and is constrained to hold in view of the present indisputable doctrines of accepted international law—that any change in our laws of neutrality during the progress of a war, which would affect unequally the relations of the United States with the nations at war, would be an unjustifiable departure from the principle of strict neutrality by which it has consistently sought to direct its actions. The placing of an embargo on the trade in arms at the present time would constitute such a change and be a direct violation of the neutrality of the United States." The Senate proposal for such a ban late in 1914 was protested by Britain and disavowed by the State Department.

Thus, on the record, the proposed discretionary grant of embargo power to the President after hostilities begin would actually encourage violation of neutrality and our direct participation in foreign war.

The record is equally clear on the prime importance of contraband other than munitions, which the Senate fails to ban. Apart from the obvious examples of cotton and scrap-iron exports which are the basis of munitions manufacture, oil and food shipments were even more important than direct munitions because more scarce. Germany could not win without starving out England, hence the submarine terror. As for the American oil which ran the Allied navies, tanks, transport, and aviation, Clemenceau voiced a truism in saying oil won the war.

To embargo munitions and permit the larger trade in such contraband as cotton, scrap, oil, and foodstuffs is to close the crack in the door carefully and leave open the whole side of the house.

Even more important is the power of loans and credits to pull us into a foreign war. By extending credit we underwrite the war, and then go to war finally to make good that investment—which we lose anyway. The idea that we can be neutral in any war in which we have millions and billions of dollars invested is fantastic. "Where thy treasure is * * *."

Let's look at the insidious record:

In Secretary of State Lansing's successful effort in 1915 to lift the original neutrality ban on belligerent loans, he wrote to President Wilson:

"Doubtless Secretary McAdoo has discussed with you the necessity of floating Government loans for the belligerent nations, which are purchasing such great quantities of goods in this country, in order to avoid a serious financial situation which will not only affect them but this country as well. * * * To withdraw any considerable amount (of gold from Europe to finance the American war trade) would disastrously affect the credit of European nations, and the consequence would be a general state of bankruptcy. If the European countries cannot find means to pay for the excess of goods sold to them * * * they will have to stop buying." In other words, the war could not continue unless America financed it.

And when we did put up the money, the French statesman, Andre Tardieu, made the very obvious observation—which seems to have escaped the Senate yesterday: "From that time on, whether desired or not, the victory of the Allies became essential to the United States."

We bailed out the bankers and we went to war. But we lost our money which has never been paid back; we lost our youths on the battlefields abroad and lost our civil liberties at home; and we added to world bankruptcy and destruction which still grips us and others today.

Such are the facts. They are the undeniable official documentary record of how we got burned before, history's tragic warning of how we may be burned again.

Unless Congress places an advance mandatory ban on all war credits to belligerents and on all shipments of contraband in American bottoms, the same major forces which destroyed our neutrality before will threaten us inevitably again.

This is the gravest issue in the world today for America.

PREVENTION OF CRIME AND TREATMENT OF CRIMINALS

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I have always taken a keen interest in the administration of justice and in criminal reform, as well as the methods necessary to accomplish such purpose, especially so in the last few years. I call the attention of Senators to an editorial printed in the Tulsa Tribune on December 24, 1934, which, to my mind, is the most clear and most sane suggestion of criminal reform that has come to my notice. This editorial is based on the experience and methods pursued by Hon. Thomas D. Lyons, judge of the district court of the State of Oklahoma, Twenty-first District, located at Tulsa, in his successful administration of criminal law. In view of its special interest, I ask, Mr. President, that this editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Tulsa (Okla.) Tribune, Dec. 24, 1934]

VOICE OF EXPERIENCE

Judge Thomas D. Lyons, who will retire from the district court bench next month, sets forth in a letter to the editor of the Tribune his views on the twin problems of prevention of crime and the proper treatment of criminals.

Judge Lyons' discussion of the problem was prompted by an editorial in the Tribune, in which the judges of Oklahoma were called upon to take the lead in working out a new probation system, which would provide proper guidance for juvenile delinquents placed under probation and stricter supervision of paroles given first offenders. His experiences with habitual criminals in his court, who have been in and out of the courts and prisons many times, prompts him to disagree with the Tribune's views. He says:

"The first duty of a judge is to hold the scales even between the State and the defendant, to the end that both sides have a fair and impartial trial. I believe that the judges may be relied on to do this. However, the State judge, as I have suggested from the bench many times, is hampered by lack of power. In my opinion, two fundamental changes in criminal procedure are necessary:

"First. The judge of district court of the State of Oklahoma should be permitted to assist the jury by commenting upon the evidence, as is now the practice in the Federal court.

"Second. The defendant, in all cases, should be subject to cross-examination by the State. (I realize that this is almost a revolutionary change, but I believe that the present crisis in crime demands it.)

"The most essential and far-reaching change, however, should be made in the probation, pardon, and parole system, and on that question I find myself differing from your views as expressed in your editorial. I suggest that the probation, pardon, and parole system should be totally abolished for a period of at least 20 years, and that no judge, board, or Governor should have power to change the penalty pronounced against a duly convicted criminal.

"The place for reform, in my opinion, is in the penal institutions. They should be made healthful, harsh, and unpleasant for the criminal, somewhat on the model of the Canadian prisons. A system of penal farms where hard exacting labor would be performed under healthful conditions might be considered."

Judge Lyons recommends this treatment only for those who have actually committed a crime, and not for juveniles who are beginning to attract the attention of their parents and teachers and the authorities as problem cases. As to the means of preventing the making of criminals out of youths who are getting off on the wrong foot, he says:

"As you sagaciously suggested in your editorial, the matter of the apparatus of courts and justice merely scratches the surface. They can isolate the convicted criminal and should do so just as a smallpox patient is quarantined in the interest of public safety, but any deep consideration of the question must take into account the conditions which make criminals.

"I believe that the conditions are in part suggested by Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler in his address of last Monday, December 17. 'In the past 50 years, instead of dominating education as it had before, religion had been thrust into the background, with the result that religious knowledge and religious interest is passing all too rapidly out of the educational process. The family and the church should accept primary responsibility for religious training.

"'So far as tax-supported schools are concerned, an odd situation has been permitted to arise. The separation of church and state is fundamental in our American political order, but as far as religious instruction is concerned, this principle has been so far departed from as to put the whole force and influence of the tax-supported school on the side of one element of the population—namely, that which is pagan and believes in no religion whatever.

"'What is needed is a complete about face of the education of youth in the family and in the school. A wholly different type of education, both in the family and in the school, must be commenced to overcome the false lure of pagan materialism and Mammon worship.'"

The Tribune not only agrees with Judge Lyons in his opinion that closer attention should be given to the forming character of youth in the schools, but we most emphatically endorse the changes he suggests in trial procedure. Impartiality in a judge, of course, is essential for the protection of the innocent. But there is no excuse for the restrictions which force a judge often to remain silent when he sees the guilty escaping justice.

The dangerous restriction placed upon the judge and State's attorney in the constitutional prohibition of cross-examination of a defendant on the witness stand protects nobody but the criminal. It is an anachronism, carried over by the Constitution makers from the fear of courts that was planted in the minds of Colonial Americans by the injustices perpetrated upon the innocent by the king's courts. The people created their own courts but they insisted upon hamstringing them as though they were to be the king's courts forever. It is time the people made the courts the people's courts in reality, and not merely in name.

Judge Lyons, who has served the people well in his efforts to protect them from criminals brought into his court, suggests that the legislature should convene a constitutional convention which would effect needed changes in the machinery of justice, among other reforms. The Tribune hopes this suggestion will form the basis of a petition to the legislators of every county in the State.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

H. R. 8726. An act to provide funds for cooperation with the board of trustees of the Warner Springs union school district, Warner Springs, Calif., in the construction of a public-school building to be available to Indian children of the Los Coyotes and Volcan Indian Reservations, Calif.

STABILIZATION OF BITUMINOUS COAL MINING INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9100) to stabilize the bituminous coal mining industry and promote its interstate commerce; to provide for cooperative marketing of bituminous coal; to levy a tax on bituminous coal and provide for a drawback under certain conditions; to declare the production, distribution, and use of bituminous coal to be affected with a national public interest; to conserve the bituminous coal resources of the United States; to provide for the general welfare and for other purposes; and providing penalties.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, if in order, I desire to offer an amendment. I notice that on yesterday there was adopted an amendment on page 10, but, in my judgment, the amendment did not go far enough. I wish now to move to amend the bill on page 10, line 8, by striking out the word "national" before the word "organization."

As the bill stands at this time, that would restrict one of the members of the district board to an employee of a national organization. I have no fight against labor unions; I think they have accomplished very much, and my sympathies are with them; but labor unions, the same as other people, will find that it is best always to be fair; and it is not fair to allow a very small group, perhaps a minority not constituting 1 percent of the total miners in a district, to have the absolute right to select the membership of the board. As the bill now stands, if the word "national" remains in it, it will simply mean that there might be in some particular district 10 members of a national organization out of 10,000 miners, and out of that 10 the representation on the board would have to be drawn.

I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that means that those who belong to no organization and who constitute a majority of the miners in any district may have no representation and no voice.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator is now discussing the unfinished business. Will he not permit me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] are necessarily detained from the Senate, and that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] is absent on official business.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I repeat the announcement heretofore made by me that my colleague the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VAN NUYS in the chair). Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I shall occupy the time of the Senate only a few minutes. I have moved that the bill be amended, on page 10, by striking out the word "national", in line 8, before the word "organization."

Yesterday the bill was amended, I believe, at the end of that particular section, in line 9, by adding the words "within the district" after the word "industry." As the bill stands at this time, it confines membership of the district board exclusively to a national organization of employees, which, of course, means the United Mine Workers. I have no quarrel with the United Mine Workers, but I believe it to be unfair to force the miners in any district to be represented by someone who may be in the minority. If there should be no national organization in the district, as I think is true in the western Kentucky coal fields today, then the miners could have no representation unless there should be organized some branch of a national organization of employees.

That is a species of coercion which no one should desire to have exerted. It is all right if the United Mine Workers should be the preponderant organization; it is all right if the miners should be satisfied; but miners belong to other organizations. Some of them may include a State; some of them may include an entire district; some of them may include only a neighborhood.

They are discriminated against; they are denied representation. As I said a moment ago, there might be only 10 members, or even only 1 member, out of 10,000 belonging to a national organization within a district, and that particular one would of necessity have to be selected for membership on the board. That, to my mind, is not fair, is not just. So the word "national" ought to be stricken out. Then that provision of the bill would read:

The remaining members of each district board shall be selected by the organization of employees representing the preponderant number of employees in the industry within the district.

In my judgment, that is fair. As it stands now it is not fair.

Moreover, I think we ought to be a little careful about what we put in the bill. In my judgment, the constitutionality of the bill is subject to very grave question. Two or three years ago, when substantially this same matter was submitted to the Committee on Mines and Mining in what is known as the "Davis-Kelly bill", the late Senator Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana, and myself, together with former Senator Robinson, of Indiana, were appointed a subcommittee and made an investigation as to the constitutionality of the bill. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] had offered an amendment, which was practically what we now call the Guffey bill. After very thorough investigation we reached the conclusion that the bill could not stand the test of the courts. It is true that the late Senator Walsh, of Montana, stated he would be willing to put it up to the Court again, but, unless the Court changed its mind, it was very probable, if it adhered to its previous decisions, that the measure would be declared to be unconstitutional.

In this case the bill contains a provision which is unfair and unjust. It is a discrimination against a large number, and perhaps against a majority, of the miners in a given district. I believe that when we attempt by law to confine membership to any particular group we are doing that which we are not justified in doing.

So I think the proponents of the bill, those who are sponsoring it, should very readily agree to strike out the word "national." I understand from Representative VINSON of Kentucky, who had the bill in charge in the House, that the committee agreed that the word "national" should be stricken out, and that it was merely through an oversight that it was not stricken from the House bill. He brought that information to me.

That is all I have to say about that particular amendment. I have another amendment or two which I desire to offer later, but I shall wait until the Senate has voted on the pending one. I do not wish at all to delay a vote on the bill. I should like to go along, as far as I possibly can, with those who favor the bill; but there are some features of it which ought to be eliminated before I can give it my support with any great degree of enthusiasm.

I shall say no more at this time.

ELECTRIC-LIGHT RATES IN ONTARIO, CANADA

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not desire to talk about the pending bill; neither do I wish to delay its consideration. There has come to me this morning, however, a bulletin just issued by Judson King, of the National Popular Government League, which I think ought to be inserted in the RECORD. I desire to make a few comments about some of the things mentioned in this bulletin by Judson King on the electric-light rates of Ontario, Canada.

Recently there has been circulated all over the United States pamphlets and magazine articles charging the Ontario Hydro is not self-liquidating, as originally promised, and that its electric light and power rates, which have been cited here for years by me and others, are not sufficiently substantial to carry the burden of keeping up the plants.

Mr. King in his bulletin analysizes these objections. One of the pamphlets is by Wendell L. Willkie, president of Commonwealth and Southern. Another publication, which I suppose all Senators have received—I know I have—is from a man by the name of Lowry, who gives his address as Toronto, Canada. It is an issue of a "Bulletin Service", to be supplied by an alleged magazine, The Ontario Power Digest, of which this man Lowry is editor. He solicits subscriptions from the Members of Congress for this "Bulletin Service" at $10 per year, issued weekly, in which the publicly owned Hydro will be attacked.

A search for his place of business in Toronto discloses the fact that it is at the front end of an old store building, occupied by an elderly insurance agent, and that Lowry appears there every few days and gets his mail. Another circular sent us by this man contains long excerpts from a new pamphlet attacking Hydro, which he states is published in Rochester, N. Y. Another one has been circulated all over New York State to antagonize the efforts of the New York Power Authority in promoting the St. Lawrence development.

Now, the electric-light facilities of Rochester, N. Y., are under the control of Hopson, whom the present committee investigating the power lobby has had on the witness stand for several days and will have on the stand for several more days. So I venture the suggestion that if the lobby committee will investigate they probably will find that Hopson is really the man who pays for and circulates the bulletins, which on their face show were prepared at a certain address in Toronto, Canada, where if one goes he can take out an accident insurance policy.

In the appendix of the bulletin of Mr. King there are two tables, which show the financial condition at the present time of the first 14 municipalities to contract with the Hydro-Electric Power Commission for wholesale current and which were the founders of Hydro. I desire to quote just a few items which appear in full as appendices to this bulletin:

For instance, the net debt of the electric plant of the city of Toronto, one of the original 14 founders, in 1913 was 93.8 percent of its assets. I understand that the city borrowed the money to put in a distribution system. Under the operation of the electric rates established by the Hydro-Electric Commission the net debt of the Toronto plant in 1934 is only 43.6 percent of its assets. In other words, up to this time Toronto has more than half wiped out the indebtedness of its electric plant. This is the highest percent of indebtedness of any of the original 14 at the present time. This is because Toronto has nearly doubled in population and has had to invest more capital for extensions than the others.

Going on down in this list, we find the city of Guelph, for instance, where the net debt of the electric plant now is only 4.3 percent of its assets. It would be interesting, I think, in that connection, to know what the electric-light rate to domestic consumers is in Guelph. The rate in that municipality is 1½ cents per kilowatt-hour to the domestic consumer.

Following on down, let us take St. Thomas, another city. It is a city which in 1933 had a population of approximately 16,000 people. The net debt of the electric plant of St. Thomas in 1934 was only 2.9 percent of its total assets. Looking at the rate of St. Thomas in 1934, we find that domestic consumers were paying 1.3 cents per kilowatt-hour.

So I might go on with all the municipalities. There is another one whose rate is only 1.8 cents per kilowatt-hour, and another one whose rate is 1.4 cents per kilowatt-hour.

For instance, let me say about St. Thomas that the amount she has to pay, in order to pay off all the indebtedness of her electric plant is $16,756. She has practically reached the time where she has no interest to pay on the investment. When all of them are averaged up, the figures show that on December 31, 1934, the end of their fiscal year, the average net debt of all those cities on their electric plants was only 16.9 percent of their entire investment.

So the net debts of the electric plants of all those 14 cities originating the Ontario Hydroelectric system, which have had longer and more experience than the others that came in later, average only 16.9 percent of their assets; and their combined earnings in 1934 were $15,883,375. They had reserves and surplus amounting to $50,357,892. There are 393 cities and towns now, and, in addition, 171 rural power districts, serving 367 townships.

That is the record which is being assailed by these critics, probably through Mr. Hopson. I hope the Lobby Committee will investigate that matter. The record of these municipal plants is the most remarkable showing of low rates known anywhere in the world. There is not a single one of those 14 cities that charges as much as 3 cents a kilowatt-hour to its domestic consumers; and there are only 3 of the 14 which show a domestic rate as much as 2 cents per kilowatt-hour. There are three that show rates in excess of 2 cents, but they are all under 3 cents.

When Senators receive these bulletins, as they probably have, and in considering the testimony which is being offered before the Lobby Committee, I desire to have them remember this remarkable financial showing.

Those cities issued bonds for the purpose of putting in the distributing systems through which they sell electricity. Most of the bonds have been liquidated, and the cities cannot buy at par the outstanding bonds. They have enough money to buy the outstanding bonds, but they are unable to buy them without putting up a big premium.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, as an appendix to my remarks, the bulletin of Mr. King, together with the appendixes attached thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HOPSON AND WILLKIE ATTACK ONTARIO HYDRO

Since 1928 the propaganda agencies of the power industry in the United States have been strangely silent about the publicly owned and operated hydroelectric power system of Ontario. In that year came the exposure by the Federal Trade Commission that the publication of the then famous Smithsonian attack upon Hydro, written by Samuel S. Wyer, consulting engineer, of Columbus, Ohio, was in fact paid for by the Duquesne Power Co. of Pittsburgh and the National Electric Light Association; that Wyer was paid several thousand dollars for a general study made for this company, a part of the data he collected being used in this pamphlet, the plates of which were destroyed by the Smithsonian soon after publication in 1925.

The public had to wait 3 years to discover the truth. Wyer, in the past 2 or 3 years, has been lecturing in universities and before church groups over the Middle West and seldom fails to rap Muscle Shoals.

But in the past few months a new Nation-wide attack upon Ontario Hydro has been launched by the industry, the outstanding spokesmen of which appear to be the Associated Gas & Electric Co., of which Howard C. Hopson is the head and who is now being probed by House and Senate investigating committees on methods used in his opposition to the President's holding-company bill, and Wendell L. Willkie, president of the Commonwealth & Southern Corporation, who for months has been misrepresenting to the Nation the facts about the power operations of the Tennessee Valley Authority at Muscle Shoals.

These gentlemen or their agencies are pointing to Ontario Hydro as a horrible example of the failure of public plants in order to undermine the confidence of the people of the South and of the Nation in the Tennessee Valley Authority, the St. Lawrence, and other yardstick projects being built under President Roosevelt's leadership.

The methods of Mr. Hopson's agents are on an ethical parity with their forged telegrams, and the accuracy of Mr. Willkie is on a par with the exploded misrepresentations of the National Electric Light Association for the past 15 years. They take their texts from the following facts:

In 1933 the Conservative Party in Ontario was defeated and the Liberals under the present Premier Hepburn won in a landslide similar to the Roosevelt landslide of the previous year. Not the principle of public ownership, but the administration of Hydro since the death in 1925 of Sir Adam Beck, founder and long the chairman, was one of the issues. The terrific slump in the industrial load on the Niagara system, due to the depression, caused primarily some operating deficits in the wholesale end of the business. Thus is afforded a chance to renew in the United States the ancient charge that Hydro rates had been too low for financial safety and the long-expected crash is near.

This bulletin contains documented facts direct from the official reports of the Ontario Hydro Commission, which prove beyond question that the propaganda of these men, whether it be by Hopson's editors or Willkie himself before the famous Economic Club of New York, is utterly unreliable and misleading, and presents as false a picture of the true status of Hydro as the publications of the old National Electric Light Association ever did. The truth is that the Hydro, despite the depression, is in the healthiest financial condition of any utility of like magnitude on the North American Continent.

MR. HOPSON'S "WIDOWS AND ORPHANS"

Mr. Hopson maintains holding companies are necessary, and weeps over the fate of widows and orphans owning securities in his holding companies if the companies are dissolved. He should be made to explain why the Hydro system, a $400,000,000 concern, serves 668 urban and farm municipalities without any holding company at all. He should explain why, without such beneficial supervision, no widow or orphan or other investor has ever lost a dollar invested in Hydro securities, and interest has been paid on the dot.

A "POWER-COST SPECIALIST" WOULD INFORM CONGRESS

Members of Congress just recently have received two communications from one E. A. Lowry, who purports to be editor of the Ontario Power Digest, published at 195 Victoria Street, Toronto, Canada, and author of Public Ownership Suffers Greatest Defeat in History, by E. A. Lowry, specialist, electric power costs. These communications are copyrighted. One offers an alleged "bulletin service" of this Digest at $10 for 52 weekly copies. The other seeks orders for a new pamphlet by Lowry, The Lid Blows Off Public Ownership, the back title reading Ontario Suffers a Rude Awakening to the Ruinous Cost of Public Ownership's Low (?) Rates. It is highly significant that the latter circular states "copies for United States of America delivery are printed in and shipped direct from Rochester, N. Y."

Now, the Rochester Gas & Electric Corporation is one of Mr. Hopson's subsidiaries, of which Mr. Herman Russell is president. Mr. Russell publishes the Gas and Electric News, which reprinted in one of its issues Lowry's Public Ownership Suffers Greatest Defeat in History, that is, in Ontario. Russell conducts a constant campaign against Hydro. Also, there has been recently circulated over New York another pamphlet by Lowry, handed the writer by a New York State official, entitled "Ontario's Costly Mistake", a handsomely printed thing in yellow covers "printed in the U. S. A." I was informed it was printed in Rochester.

Further, the Security Holders number of Mr. Hopson's Associated Magazine for which a national circulation of 300,000 was claimed, contains an unsigned article Ontario Hydro No Longer An Idol of Pure Gold, of the same kidney as Lowry's writings. It would be an interesting thing for an investigating committee to discover just how Mr. Lowry's activities are financed.

MISINFORMATION FOR CONGRESS

Lowry's advertising circulars to Congressmen are in themselves propaganda and come at the right minute to influence votes on the holding-company bill and the T. V. A. bill. For example, we find the bulletin devoted to an alleged exposé of the "intense opposition to drastic rate increases" in Sudbury, Ontario, summarized thus:

"The outstanding changes effected are that Sudbury's commercial cooking consumers have had their charges increased from a rate of 1.6 to 5 cents per kilowatt-hour, whereas domestic consumers, who similarly use Hydro for cooking, have had their rates reduced from approximately 3 to 1.7 cents per kilowatt-hour. * * * The underlying cause of the Hydroelectric Power Commission's startling incongruity in effecting the foregoing rates can be traced to political expediency", etc., etc.

A telegram from the Hydroelectric Power Commission of Ontario just received by the writer throws real light on the situation of great interest. Sudbury owns its own distributing system and up to January 1, 1935, purchased its wholesale power from a private company. It then made a contract with the Hydro Commission for power and, of course, came under its regulations. These regulations require rates to be fixed at the exact cost of service to each class of customers. Among other things the Hydro Commission's engineers discovered two former Sudbury practices which were in violation of its rules.

First, the city council had been selling current to hotels, restaurants, etc., at below cost—a special privilege. Second, they had kept their domestic and other rates high and the profits amounting to around $125,000 annually, had been turned into the city treasury. The domestic rates were above the cost of service.

Now, Hydro for the past 25 years has refused to permit its units to be used as a taxing agency, and load general city expenses off on the light and power users. That is one reason why Ontario rates are so low and why many American municipal rates are as high as private rates.

The Commission, of course, brought the commercial cooking rate up to where it paid its way and dropped the domestic rates to where they belonged, and made reductions all around which will compel the city authorities of Sudbury to absorb this $125,000 surplus and return it to the customers in the form of lower rates. This sound practice is practically the same as that of the T. V. A. Favored business men, politicians, and private companies do not like that kind of strict justice and efficient business method, and so a single justifiable raise on one class of the customers in one town is made to lend color to the general claim that the cost of power is rising in Ontario. The complete telegram of the Commission is attached as appendix A.

As might be expected, Lowry's figures that commercial cooking rate has been increased from 1.6 cents to 5 cents per kilowatt-hour are not accurate. The new rate is 4 cents for the first 100 kilowatt-hours, 2½ cents for the next 100, and 1½ cents for all additional, a rate lower than most Americans have to pay.

WHO IS E. A. LOWRY?

Mr. Lowry's twisted picture, then, harmonizes exactly with Mr. Hopson's purposes, and it becomes interesting to know just who this expert is who seems to be in favor with the Associated Gas & Electric. The writer inquired about him last December in Toronto, and found the following:

Not a single copy of the alleged magazine, the Ontario Power Digest, of which he is the supposed editor, has ever been issued.

No. 195 Victoria Street, the supposed office of the publication, is an old, dingy, third-class store building, the front end, the first floor of which is occupied by an old insurance man where Lowry gets his mail and where he seldom stays more than 10 minutes at a time.

He is not an electrical engineer, but was once employed in a subordinate capacity in the Hydro at Guelph. For several years he has posed as a rate expert to private manufacturers and sought employment in that capacity. The character of his services and his standing in Ontario may be judged from the following excerpts from the leading editorial in Electrical News and Engineering, published by MacLean, at Toronto, for April 1, 1934. It reads in part:

IS THIS BILL A RACKET?—BEWARE OF BOGUS POWER-COST SPECIALIST

"Over the past few years we have heard many complaints from manufacturing concerns and even from municipalities as to the activities of a so-called "power-cost specialist" (I was informed this meant Lowry) who, as far as we can learn, is not a qualified electrical engineer. It appears that this "specialist" has been going around Ontario collecting large fees from power users and, as far as we can ascertain, has been unable to justify his work. His procedure is to interest the power user in saving money on his power bills, obtaining as early as possible a retainer or advance payment on his fees. In many cases when his clients were not satisfied with the progress or the type of reports made by the self-styled "power-cost specialist" they had difficulty in getting back their books, contracts, bills, etc., and in some cases could only get them on payment of a sight draft.

"Our purpose in warning the industry of this specialist's activities is because we consider that his operations have done considerable harm in the progress of the industry. * * * Furthermore, the reports made by this "specialist" have not, to our knowledge, been substantiated."

William A. Murray, of Murray & Flood, New York; Samuel S. Wyer, Prof. E. A. Stewart, and others whose work has been utilized for propaganda, were at least qualified engineers. But Lowry is not and not even a trusted specialist. He is now writing the kind of false stuff about his home Hydro that is suited to the purposes of the American Power Trust. Is Hopson back of him? And are we to have a series of bulletins from him in the future, falsifying Hydro experiences?

MR. WILLKIE BEFORE THE ECONOMIC CLUB AND HARVARD BUSINESS SCHOOL CLUBS OF NEW YORK

In an address last January before a joint meeting of the above highly respected clubs, on Government and the Public Utilities, Mr. Wendell L. Willkie, president of the Commonwealth & Southern, devoted a good deal of attention to Ontario Hydro. Only a few of his many misrepresentations of fact can be noted here.

The first is the charge that Hydro has not proved self-liquidating, as promised. Willkie notes that the President's power projects are to be amortized in 25 years, and goes on:

"The original amortization period of the Ontario project was to be 30 years. At the end of this time the electric facilities would belong to the people free of debt. The program has been in effect just for that long. Is it free of debt? The Hydro Commission itself has liabilities of $266,000,000 against undepreciated assets of $283,000,000. As to the municipalities, their liabilities now total $50,000,000 against undepreciated assets of $90,000,000. Thus the whole system, undepreciated, is on the books at $374,000,000 and 30 years after the founding of the Hydro it has outstanding obligations of $316,000,000."

According to this the Hydro should be all out of debt by January 1, 1935. That gives the start of Hydro as of 1905. The Hydro Act was not passed until 1906–7. The first current was not turned on until 1910. The total assets of the commission at that time was less than $3,000,000 and of the 14 municipalities being served about the same.

Since that time the enterprise has grown until it is serving over 600 municipalities and farm districts, and the grand total assets $477,859,000. The major part of the bonds have been issued since 1916, and a large part of those are not due until 1950–70.

The balance sheet of the commission attached hereto shows reserves and surpluses in 1934 of over $74,000,000, doubtless sufficient to cover the first investment of $3,000,000.

So Willkie's charge is merely absurd. There might be some slight chance for Willkie's assertion to be fragmentarily correct if he could show that a single one of the first 14 municipalities to join Hydro had defaulted on their original bonds or were in financial difficulties—or any of the later ones, for that matter. This he cannot do. The writer has a statement from the chief accountant of the Hydro, showing that the last of the original debentures of these 14 places issued in 1910–11 in nine cases will not be due until 1941 and that only one small town, Hespeler, falls within his limit of January 1, 1935. Much capital has been invested in extensions by these municipalities since 1911, especially Toronto, the retirement dates being far beyond 1940.

SERVICE AND STATUS OF THE ORIGINAL FOURTEEN

The low rates, high usage, and healthy financial condition of the distributing plants of the original 14 municipalities, ranging in size from over 600,000 down to 1,400 in population, should be encouraging to the officials and citizens of the Tennessee Valley as a prophecy of what will happen to them, and to other yardstick projects like the St. Lawrence, if the service from the generator to the consumers' meters is kept under public operation.

The statistical tables I and II, regarding the first 14, attached as appendices B and C to this bulletin, are demonstrations of what is possible and per contra to unfairness of high rates charged by the Power Trust in this country. The numbered paragraphs below key with the columns in these tables, and show that—

1. From 1913 to 1933 the population of these 14 municipalities increased from 526,000 to 840,000, or 60 percent.

2. Domestic revenue increased from $331,000 to $5,124,000, or 1,448 percent.

3. Domestic consumption increased from 6,880,000 to 350,000,000 kilowatt-hours, or 4,990 percent.

4. Domestic consumers increased in number from 31,000 to 205,000, or 556 percent.

5. The average domestic usage increased from 17.3 to 134 kilowatt-hours monthly, or 672 percent.

6. The average domestic monthly bill increased from $1.05 to $2.29, or 118 percent.

7. The net cost per kilowatt-hour for domestic service dropped from 6.19 cents to 1.76 cents, or 72 percent.

8. The total assets of the electrical departments of the 14 municipalities in 1913 was $8,970,000. In 1933 they had grown to $77,300,000, an increase of 762 percent.

9. The total liabilities increased from $8,000,000 to $30,910,000, or by 286 percent.

10. The total of the standard reserves and operating surplus increased from $952,000 to $46,389,000, or 4,760 percent.

11. The total annual revenue increased from $1,874,000 to $15,210,000, or 770 percent.

12. And, finally, the percent of net debt to total assets of the group dropped from 77.1 percent to 20.4 percent.

RESULTS FOR 1934

Your attention is called to the figures for 1934. This bulletin has been delayed until the 1934 report was available. These data show that notwithstanding the depression, then in its fifth year, domestic consumption has increased and average costs have consequently lowered, while assets have grown and liabilities diminished. So that, whereas these municipalities as a group were in debt 77.1 cents on each dollar of assets in 1913, and 20.4 cents in 1933, their debt was lowered in 1934 to 16.9 cents. This is the final answer to the charge of "failure of self-liquidation."

But note that while the liabilities are nearly $31,000,000 the reserves and surpluses total over $46,000,000, and in many instances these surpluses far exceed the book liabilities. The municipalities would buy the outstanding bonds, but the investors won't part with them in many cases, since they are too safe an investment.

While domestic usage is given above in discussing rates, commercial and industrial and municipal rates show like reductions and increase in use.

AS TO THE DEFICITS

Mr. Willkie's address was printed in pamphlet form and sent out. It was reprinted in the February issue of the official bulletin of the Edison Electrical Institute and elsewhere, and so will be used as a textbook for power editors and speakers before all kinds of clubs and chambers of commerce over the Nation. Much is made of three recent deficits on the Niagara system, the only ones since organization, and of the "increase in cost of Ontario power." Moral: The Hydro is losing money to be saddled on the rate or taxpayers. Rates are coming up and doom is in sight. These ideas are repeated by the Wall Street Journal, the New York Sun, and various other great newspapers as a warning against the President's power policy.

It is not pointed out that rates to consumers have not been raised; that the deficits were easily met by a slight raise in the wholesale cost of power to municipalities, and by drawing on the contingency or rate-stabilization fund established in 1925 to meet emergencies of this kind; nor that the reserves and surpluses of the commission total over $74,000,000 and of the municipalities of over $93,000,000.

From official reports and personal investigation in Toronto, the writer can state the following as the essential facts, which should alarm nobody not yearning for disaster:

The Hydro is owned by the cooperating municipalities. They do their own local financing and distributing. Wholesale power is furnished by the provincial commission, which acts as a trustee and manager for them. There are four independent systems—the Georgian Bay, the Eastern Ontario, the Thunder Bay, and the Niagara, the last named being the largest and serving Ontario's great industrial center.

When the depression hit in 1930, manufacturing slumped in Ontario as in the United States, cutting off a great source of revenue. The result was an operating deficit on this system for 1932 of $2,544,000; for 1933, of $4,236,000; and for 1934 of $2,869,000. The contingency fund set up as stated to meet acts of God and depressions had a balance at the beginning of 1932 of $14,629,000.

The deficits were met and there was left in this fund at the beginning of the present fiscal year $6,567,000, with sinking fund and depreciation and all other reserves and operating expenses being cared for. The rise in the cost of wholesale power to municipalities was about $1.50 per horsepower in 1932, $4.50 in 1933, and about the same in 1934.

Another factor contributing to these deficits was the fact that a former commission had contracted for some 471,000 horsepower from Quebec private companies at $15 per horsepower delivered at the boundary line, and that the blocks of this power due were not needed but had to be paid for. Had it not been for these contracts, the commission could have met all demands from its own generating plants, some 40 in number, and there would have been no deficits.

Today the load factor is rising, and if the depression continues to lift, the Niagara system will be out of the red before long. Even if it does not, since these contracts were illegal and have been canceled, we may expect no further deficits from Hydro.

WHAT IF RATES HAD BEEN RAISED TO MEET THE DEFICIT?

As noted, retail rates have not been raised. But suppose they had. Suppose the $2,869,000 wholesale deficit of 1934 on the Niagara system had been met, not from the contingency fund, but from increased rates to all consumers. What would the increase have been?

Answer to this pertinent question is given in official data just received from the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission. This shows that the increase would only have been 0.64 mill per kilowatt-hour and domestic consumers would have had their average costs raised from 1.51 cents to 1.57 cents per kilowatt-hour. The statement follows:

"The ultimate source of all revenue—whether received by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario through its operations or from the municipalities served by the commission through their operations—is obtained from the consumer. The revenue collected from consumers for the service supplied by the municipalities is divided so as to pay for the power purchased from the commission, and also for the expense incurred by the local utility in supplying its customers.

AVERAGE COST OF ONLY 1.51 CENTS PER KILOWATT-HOUR TO CONSUMERS

"The average revenue for domestic service received by all Hydro municipalities throughout the Province of Ontario during 1934 was 1.51 cents per kilowatt-hour. Had the Hydro municipalities supplied from the Niagara system been billed for all charges included in the cost of power which they received during 1934, including standard contingency charge, without any assistance in the way of withdrawing from the Accumulated Contingency and Obsolescence Fund, and had these additional charges been apportioned equally to all consumers, then the domestic consumers would have had to pay an additional amount of 0.064 cents per kilowatt-hour, making the total average cost per kilowatt-hour of energy supplied to Hydro domestic consumers 1.57 cents per kilowatt-hour."

Compare this figure of 1.57 cents per kilowatt-hour with 5.30 cents per kilowatt-hour, which is the average price paid for domestic electric service in the United States, as reported by the Statistical Bulletin No. 2 (April 1935) of the Edison Electric Institute. Compare it with the average rate of 4.5 cents per kilowatt-hour claimed for the Niagara-Hudson System for 1934 by Floyd L. Carlisle, chairman of the board, and of 3.85 cents per kilowatt-hour for the North American Co. claimed by its president. (See New York Times, Apr. 10, 1935, pp. 29 and 35.)

"TAXES"

"Taxes" and the fact that Hydro does not pay taxes comparable to private utilities does not explain the difference between the average cost of domestic power service in Ontario, which is under 2 cents per kilowatt-hour, and the average cost in the United States of over 5 cents per kilowatt-hour. For years our power companies claimed they paid 10 percent of gross revenue for taxes. Now they claim 13 to 15 percent. This needs demonstrating, but taking them at their word, if we add 15 percent, or 3 mills, to the Ontario figure per kilowatt-hour, it will not go far toward explaining the other 3 cents or more.

THE COST OF POWER

Years ago the Hydro cut in half or more the price of wholesale power to municipalities or large manufacturers from what private costs were. It is, therefore, amusing to have American power executives now get so excited over a perfectly normal increase in the cost of Hydro power, due to technical and financial reasons, as against costs in the 1910–15 period.

The plant of Ontario Power Co., from which Hydro first bought power and which it later purchased, was a low-cost development located right at the Falls.

The plant of Chippewa-Queenstown development, completed by the Hydro in 1921, is located 5 miles below the Falls, and has a 305-foot head, double that at the Falls, and served by a great canal cut through rock. It cost $73,000,000, is being amortized, operating costs have been higher than in 1910, and all these factors increase the cost at the bus bar. Only two cities ever got power at $15; the rest were above. The average delivered cost per horsepower to municipalities of the Niagara system is shown in a memorandum furnished the writer recently by the commission. It runs from $26.38 per horsepower for 1922 to as low as $23.70 in 1929, and in 1933 stood at $28.48.

The at cost principle on which Hydro is based applies, and each municipality pays what it costs to serve it. Hence costs vary. It costs as high as $60 per horsepower to serve some small ones in distant locations.

WHY QUEBEC CONTRACTS WERE CANCELED

The Liberal Legislature of Ontario, when it came to power, passed an act canceling the contracts for wholesale power made in 1930 by the former Hydro Commission under the aegis of the Conservative administration. This act has not yet been signed by the lieutenant governor, but doubtless will be, and it is rumored that an arrangement is being considered whereby the Hydro Commission will take from these private companies only such power as its needs justify. The Dominion Government has acquiesced in this act of the Provincial Legislature, thereby admitting its validity.

In the opinion of this writer, this action is a splendid demonstration of the intelligence and courage of the citizenship of Ontario, and of their capacity to democratically control their utility. The Hepburn government, in passing this act, was carrying out an overwhelming mandate of the people. Only the briefest resume of the situation can be given here.

THE BECK POLICIES

It was a fixed policy of Sir Adam Beck and the Hydro Commission, of which he was chairman from 1906 to 1925, when he died, to keep clear of entangling connections with private utility corporations, and at the time of his death he was generating 95 percent of his power. But more would soon be needed. The commission was independent, was death on political patronage or favors, and conducted the Hydro on strict business principles. After Beck's death Premier Ferguson and a commission, which he appointed, abandoned Beck's policy, and instead of developing the Niagara or building a steam plant or developing the St. Lawrence for added power the policy was adopted of purchasing power from the Quebec private corporations. This policy was unpopular. Heavy contracts, totaling 471,000 horsepower at $15 per horsepower of over $7,000,000, were entered into in 1930 after the depression over $7,000,000 were entered into in 1930 after the depression struck.

The Quebec companies capitalized these contracts and issued bonds to build the plants in part. There were mysterious doings which aroused apprehension, since Hydro had always been free from political manipulation. The Liberals charged, and the people feared, there was some connection between the financiers of Montreal, influential with the Conservative government at Ottawa, and the Conservative government of Ontario. For example, the Henry government of 1930 made a contract to purchase 100,000 horsepower from a subsidiary of the Abitibi Paper & Power Co. in northern Ontario. The subsidiary failed, the Henry government bought it out at $90 per share when its securities were selling on the stock exchange at around $40. Henry was forced to admit on the floor of Parliament that he owned $25,000 of the company's securities. This set the woods of popular indignation aflame, just as it would in the United States, and was one factor in the overthrow of the administration. The popular slogan was, "Back to Beck." Further investigations justified this popular apprehension. Attorney General Roebuck in a 4-day speech before the legislature told the whole story, and repeated it to the people over the radio. It appears beyond question that certain basic things in these contracts were illegal and the Dominion Government has acquiesced and the companies have brought no suit.

An entirely new commission was appointed, at the head of which was placed Hon. T. Stewart Lyon, who enjoys the confidence of the people of Ontario as to his integrity and ability and devotion to Hydro. Mr. Lyon, as editor of the Toronto Globe, was a close personal friend and adviser of Sir Adam Beck from the beginning, and all through the struggle against private interests when Hydro needed honest newspaper support. He had retired but was called into service. Under Chairman Lyon, Hydro has returned to its old policies and is forging ahead. It is in an exceedingly sound financial condition, and all the more safe because it is now freed from the contracts entered into by the former commission, which, to say the least, entirely misjudged the effect and the duration of this depression.

To interpret such an episode as a refutation of the people of Ontario of the principle of public ownership, and to magnify two or three deficits into a major disaster without giving the true financial status of the Hydro's affairs, is simply one more evidence of the utter disregard for truth and common fairness exhibited by the controlling factors of utilities in the United States.

The true financial status of the commission, which controls the wholesale end of the enterprise, will be evident to any person who will take the time to consult the condensed balance sheets for 1933 and 1934, respectively, furnished by the chief accountant of the commission, and added hereto as appendixes D and E.

TORONTO, ONTARIO, August 20, 1935.

JUDSON KING,
Takoma Park, Md.:

Up to December 1934 city of Sudbury purchased power for its municipally owned distribution system under a contract with a private power company. The power-company assets were purchased by the commission. The city has entered into a new power agreement with the commission. Prior to December 31, 1934, profits from operation of the Sudbury municipal electric plant amounted to an average of about $125,000 per year, which surplus was used by the city for general purposes.

Under the commission's agreement to supply power to the city there is a clause which provides that the rate of 8 cents per kilowatt-hour charged for lighting by the city must be reduced each year for a period of 5 years to wipe out the above surplus at a rate of not less than $20,000 per year. When first-rate adjustment was made this year it was found that the city had been giving preferred rate to commercial cooking customers much below cost. In the preliminary rate adjustment no provision was made for a special rate for commercial cooking, which was going to result in a considerable increase to this special class of consumer. The matter was further considered, and a commercial-cooking rate was recommended to the municipal officials of 4 cents for the first 100 hours of use of connected load, 2½ cents for the next hundred hours' use of connected load, and 1½ cents per kilowatt-hour for all additional consumption per month. This special commercial-cooking rate compares with a domestic rate of 7 cents for the first 30 kilowatt-hours per month and 1½ cents for all additional monthly consumption.

This proposed adjustment of commercial cooking rate results in commercial customers paying approximately 55 percent more for energy for cooking purposes than domestic consumers.

The accounts of the municipal hydros are audited by the respective city auditors and by the commission's auditors. All accounts are accepted by banks and others as beyond challenge, and they have never been questioned in Ontario.

JUNE 6, 1935.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, for the purpose of the RECORD, in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska, I wish to call attention to the municipal plants in Minnesota. Many of them charge a higher rate for electricity than is charged by private utilities. Whenever they do, they make so much money out of the electric plants that very often the people of the communities have to pay little in taxes. They have a kind of a sales tax on electricity to take the place of taxes. I have in mind one plant which, in a small town, lighted the streets of the town, conducted a sewage-disposal plant, and made $30,000 profit.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not the exact data here, but I should like to say, in connection with the very valuable information which the Senator has given, that there are many cities and municipalities in the United States where no municipal taxes are levied, but the expenses are paid out of the rates.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that in all the propaganda of the utilities these high rates are mentioned, but it is not stated that it is a form of collection of taxes on the sale of electricity for the purpose of reducing the real-estate and property taxes. That, to my knowledge, is never mentioned in the propaganda of the utility companies.

STABILIZATION OF BITUMINOUS COAL MINING INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9100) to stabilize the bituminous coal mining industry and promote its interstate commerce; to provide for cooperative marketing of bituminous coal; to levy a tax on bituminous coal and provide for a drawback under certain conditions; to declare the production, distribution, and use of bituminous coal to be affected with a national public interest; to conserve the bituminous-coal resources of the United States; to provide for the general welfare, and for other purposes; and providing penalties.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Kentucky whether the amendment which he has just offered relates to lines 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 on page 10?

Mr. LOGAN. Only to line 8. I am merely suggesting that we strike out the word "national." An amendment has already been adopted, after the word "industry", to add the words "within the district." That was agreed to yesterday. The thing I am seeking by this amendment, if the Senate will agree to it, is to make sure that representation on the board will not be confined to those who belong to a national organization.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator. But, if I understand the bill, it seems to take no cognizance of coal miners who are not members of the United Mine Workers. It speaks of a national organization, and, as I understand, it has reference to the organization referred to. It is this organization that threatened to strike, and its influence, as I am told, has been powerful in the formulation of this bill. I cannot help but believe that one of the results of this bill, if not one of its objects, is to strengthen the hands of the United Mine Workers' organizations and to superimpose upon it mine workers who are not members of the organization and who may not desire to become members of the same. I have no objection to any organization of miners or employees. But it would seem that this measure seeks unduly to strengthen its hands and to weaken the authority of the producers, or at least to force them into relations which neither might willingly approve, and to add to the burdens of the consuming public.

Mr. LOGAN. This provision is entirely unfair as it stands and the one word is all I am asking to strike out.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] is opposed by the sponsors and friends of the bill. But to avoid the delay of debate and the danger of the final adjournment of the Congress before the bill is passed the amendment is accepted in order that it may be considered in conference. If I am appointed a conferee on the part of the Senate I shall undertake to accomplish what the Senate desires in the matter, regardless of my personal opposition to the amendment.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I understand the Senator is not accepting the amendment except for the purpose of taking it to conference and letting it abide the action of the conference.

Mr. NEELY. Though the Senate should adopt the amendment by unanimous consent, it would nevertheless have to abide the action of the conferees.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, that is absolutely true; regardless of whether it is adopted by a vote of the Senate or whether it is accepted and adopted perfunctorily, it will have to abide the action of the conference. But in view of the fact that the House committee, I am advised, agreed that it should go out, and it was left in the bill in the House through an oversight, I have no fear what may happen in the conference.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is obvious from what the Senator from West Virginia just stated that whoever is responsible for the pending bill with regard to the pending amendment or any amendment as wholly unacceptable which gave the employees in the mining districts, who were not members of the United Mine Workers' organization, any voice in such organization or any other organization which might affect the producers or the employees.

My information is that there is a large number of coal miners who do not belong to the United Mine Workers' organization. If I understand the Senator's statement, it would seem that his view is that no provision should be made for representation by employees who are not members of the national organization, and that the view embodied in the statement of the Senator from Kentucky would not be willingly accepted, either by the Senator or those for whom he speaks, or by the United Mine Workers' officials.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I hope I do not misinterpret the Senator. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator does not misinterpret me. I am unalterably opposed to any amendment to the pending bill, or to any other bill, which attempts to justify fraudulent company unions. In my opinion, if this amendment should prevail, it would tend to fortify company unions to the prejudice of the United Mine Workers of America.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator would not impute that view to the able Senator from Kentucky, who offered the amendment.

Mr. NEELY. I have not impugned the motives of the Senator from Kentucky; I have simply appraised his amendment in my effort to protect a great, legitimate union of employees against company unions, which frequently rob their members of their liberty and make them the slaves of those who employ them.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator will not consume all of my time. There has been opposition to company unions, and I have no doubt that in many cases they have not served a useful purpose. I hold no brief for them. I do not favor legislation, either by the States or by Congress, which seeks to compel persons in order to obtain work to join unions of any kind. I would contend as earnestly for the rights of union organizations and their members as I would for any other legitimate association or organization; and I would as earnestly contend for the right of individuals to join or not to join any union. In other words, I would not debar an individual from obtaining work because he was not a member of either a company or a miner's union. This is a free country and individuals should be protected in their rights and should not be discriminated against in any way because they are members of a union or because they are not members of a union.

And I am opposed to legislation which would compel every person seeking employment to join any labor union, or, for that matter, any union, in order to obtain employment. I may have misunderstood the Senator from West Virginia, but his observations gave me the impression that this bill would result in all employees in mines becoming members of miners' unions.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. In a moment. May I say that I have favored employees' unions. Many years ago I organized in my State what I understood was the first miners' union, and for many years at various times I represented labor unions—some of them unions of mine employees.

I know that many employees have been subjected to harsh and inequitable treatment by their employers. I have seen the benefits that have arisen from labor organizations, and I would do everything within my power in a legitimate way to protect them and to protect the rights of their members. I have said upon many occasions that if I were a miner, or carpenter, or engaged in work which is performed by members of unions, I should seek membership therein. However, I would not favor legislation which compelled individuals to affiliate with any labor union or organization in order to obtain employment.

Did the Senator wish to interrupt me?

Mr. NEELY. I challenge the able Senator from Utah to point out a single sentence or syllable in the bill which justifies or tends to justify the contention that the purpose of the measure is to compel all the coal miners to become members of the United Mine Workers of America.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think a critical examination of the measure leads to that conclusion, and if I understand the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky it is to permit persons who are not members of the national miners' union to have the same rights to employment as members of that union have. As I understand, the Senator objects to the amendment because it would interfere with the activities of the miners' national organization.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I do not wish to address myself to the amendment, but I desire to direct the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to page 4 of the bill.

On page 4, line 7, occurs the following sentence:

> Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office, none of whom shall be related to any member of the commission within the third degree by blood or marriage.

Does the Senator have in mind correcting that apparent incongruity?

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, manifestly the language to which the Senator from Oregon refers is hopelessly confused. It must be clarified.

Mr. STEIWER. I should be very glad if the Senator from West Virginia would undertake to clarify that language.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I shall be very much obliged to my very scholarly friend from Oregon if he will propose an amendment which will make perfectly clear what is the obvious intention of the draftsmen of the bill.

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator from Oregon would not undertake to clarify language which refers to the third degree by blood or marriage. He might undertake to consider clarifying language referring to the third degree by blood, but not the third degree by marriage.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator from Oregon intimate that marriage might at times involve the use of the "third degree"? [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the proponents of the measure and those in charge of the bill have, on the condition which was stated, accepted the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I understood. It is to be adopted either without objection or by vote.

Mr. KING. I ask for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MURPHY. I send an amendment to the desk, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 25, after line 23, to insert the following new paragraph:

> It shall not be an unfair method of competition or a violation of the code or any requirement of this act (1) to sell to or through any bona fide and legitimate cooperative organization (including any farmers' cooperative duly organized under the laws of any State, Territory, the District of Columbia, or the United States) whether or not such organization grants rebates, discounts, patronage dividends, or other similar benefits to its members; (2) to sell through any intervening agency to any such cooperative organization; or (3) to pay or allow to any such cooperative organization any discount, commission, rebate, or dividend ordinarily paid or allowed, or permitted by the code to be paid or allowed, to other purchasers for purchases in wholesale or middleman quantities.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, an attempt was made under the code of the bituminous-coal operators under the National Industrial Recovery Act to bar cooperative organizations from acting as brokers of coal. They compete with other brokers in the cities, and it was believed that their competitors were instrumental in securing the insertion of this code provision. The alleged objection to farmers' cooperatives is that they pay patronage dividends to their members, and under the definition of "rebates and discounts" patronage dividends have been included, because including commissions paid to agents of cooperatives by coal operators. I direct the attention of the Senators in charge of the bill to paragraph 12 on page 25, which provides:

> 12. Selling to, or through, any broker, jobber, commission account, or sales agency, which is in fact or in effect an agency or an instrumentality of a retailer or an industrial consumer or of an organization of retailers or industrial consumers, whereby they or any of them secure either directly or indirectly a discount, dividend, allowance, or rebates, or a price other than that determined in the manner prescribed by this act.

That is defined as an unfair practice. When this question arose under the N. R. A. code the President issued an Executive order forbidding discrimination against cooperatives, and apparently under the language of the bill as drawn that Executive order is in conflict with the bill itself. I read from the Executive order as issued by the President:

> No such code of fair competition shall be construed or interpreted so as to prevent any such cooperative organization from being entitled to receive, and/or distribute to its members as patronage dividends or otherwise, the proceeds or benefits directly or indirectly derived from any discount, commission, rebate, or dividend (a) ordinarily paid or allowed to other purchasers for purchases in wholesale or middleman quantities or (b) paid or allowed pursuant to the requirements or provisions of any code of fair competition to other purchasers for purchases in wholesale or middleman quantities.

What the President accomplished with his Executive order is undone, as I view it, in paragraph 12, which I have read, and which paragraph goes so far as explicitly to prohibit dividends.

In my State and in numerous other States are cooperative organizations. To illustrate, in my State there is the Farmers' Supply Co. It makes a deal with an operator for coal to be supplied to the 300 cooperative farmers' organizations in Iowa. That operator pays this Farmers' Supply Co., acting for the cooperatives, a commission, and that commission finds its way back to the members of the cooperatives in a patronage dividend; and the amendment which I have sent to the desk seeks to do no more, and does no more, than assure that the letter and the spirit of the President's order shall be carried into the act. If the intent was not to deprive the farmers' cooperatives of their present buying rights this amendment cannot interfere with that intent. If the bill does deny that right to the farmers, then the amendment is necessary of adoption to secure that right to them and to express, as I have said, the letter and spirit of the Executive order.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. What proportion of the dividend to which the Senator refers is actually received by the farmers themselves? All of it or just a portion of it?

Mr. MURPHY. The farmers' cooperative handles other things besides coal. It will handle grain, and so forth; and in what is consigned to the farmers' cooperative for resale the excess over cost and administrative expense is converted back to the members of these cooperatives.

Mr. NEELY. In the opinion of the Senator from Iowa how much tonnage would be affected by the amendment which he has proposed?

Mr. MURPHY. In my State alone the Farmers Supply Co. to which I referred, as agents of the "co-ops", handles 1,000 carloads of coal a year.

Mr. NEELY. Has the Senator any information as to the tonnage it would affect in other States?

Mr. MURPHY. I do not have any. I know that it is similarly handled in other States. There is a like organization in Ohio which I specifically know about. The scope of it, I suppose, is the scope of the grain cooperative movement in America.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 25, after line 23, to insert the following new paragraph:

It shall not be an unfair method of competition or a violation of the code or any requirement of this act (1) to sell to or through any bona fide and legitimate cooperative organization (including any farmers' cooperative duly organized under the laws of any State, Territory, the District of Columbia, or the United States) whether or not such organization grants rebates, discounts, patronage dividends, or other similar benefits to its members; (2) to sell through any intervening agency to any such cooperative organization; or (3) to pay or allow to any such cooperative organization any discount, commission, rebate, or dividend ordinarily paid or allowed, or permitted by the code to be paid or allowed, to other purchasers for purchases in wholesale or middleman quantities.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I will state, in order that the RECORD may be clear, that this amendment is presented in good faith, with no other purpose than to assure cooperatives the right granted them under the President's Executive order. If it goes further than that, I shall be very happy to have someone point out wherein it does, and I shall be glad to exclude that from the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, on page 27, line 9, after the word "Labor", to insert "Provided, That not more than two members of the board shall be members of the same political party."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated by the clerk.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 27, line 9, after the word "Labor", to insert "Provided, That not more than two members of the board shall be members of the same political party."

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, it is the misfortune of the senior Senator from West Virginia to have been engaged in conversation with other Senators relative to some provisions of the bill at the time the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] stated his amendment. May the amendment again be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be restated.

The amendment of Mr. DAVIS was again stated.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, there is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I thought a similar amendment was adopted yesterday.

Mr. NEELY. A similar amendment was adopted with reference to the commission. The amendment now offered has relation to the labor board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the proper place in the bill, it is proposed to insert the following:

TAX ON CRUDE PETROLEUM

SEC. —. Effective on the first day of the first calendar month following the date of the enactment of this act, subsection (a) of section 604 of the Revenue Act of 1934 is amended to read as follows:

"(a) There is hereby imposed on crude petroleum sold by the producer thereof a tax of one-half of 1 cent per gallon, to be paid by the producer. Under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, such tax shall not apply to crude petroleum produced from any well which is not capable of producing more than 5 barrels, of 42 gallons each, per day."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I recognize that the coal business is in a most deplorable plight, which has resulted from several causes. During the World War period and in the post-war inflationary period the industry was overdeveloped both in plant capacity and in the number of employees. From this overproduction there has, of course, naturally resulted competition of a type and character which has made it almost impossible for coal companies to have any sort of prosperous business, to operate at full time, or to provide regular employment for their employees. Recognizing that disorganized condition in the coal industry and the need for some relief, the need for some action by which better wages may be accorded to the workers, I am going to vote for the pending bill; but in doing so I think we should take into consideration the effect of the bill in the matter of the loss of production that may result from an increase in the cost of coal production; and, taking that into consideration, to consider whether it is fair and just and right for the coal industry to bear that entire burden against the probable increased competition of other forms of energy.

I have two tables taken from the Bureau of Mines Mineral Yearbook for 1934. I ask unanimous consent to have these tables printed following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the tables will be printed as requested.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wish to point out, without going through the entire table, the distressing situation which has resulted in the coal industry. In 1913 the percentage of energy provided by coal was 84.22 percent; in 1932 that percentage went down to 52.23. The reduction has been constant since 1933 and has been due in large measure to the increased use of competitive fuels, such as oil, which has been particularly disturbing to the coal business in my immediate section of the country, and also natural gas.

Mr. President, coal has constantly borne its share of taxation. It does so in two ways. There is an ad valorem tax upon coal land, representing a cumulative burden upon the cost of mine production. In short, taxes have run year after year upon coal land before the coal is mined, thereby constantly increasing the carrying charges of the coal land. In addition to that ad valorem tax upon coal, which, by reason of being levied for so many years before coal is removed from the ground, is unusually burdensome, we also know that in most of the States there is a tax levied upon each ton of coal as it is brought from the mine.

The situation with oil and natural gas is entirely different. They are fugitive elements. No ad valorem tax can be levied upon them as they remain in the ground unrecovered and moving from section to section. They are relieved from that burden of taxation. In addition to that there is no tax upon the recovery of oil and natural gas similar to the tonnage tax levied upon coal that is brought out from the ground.

So I submit that, if this amendment should be adopted, it would be an aid to the employees of the coal mines; it would tend, at least, to prevent a dimunition of the coal supply; it would tend to equalize the burden that the coal industry must carry under this bill and would place some part of a compensating burden on oil and natural gas.

So, with these suggestions, Mr. President, I submit this amendment as being in the public interest and as being in the interest of the operators and of the employees of the coal mines.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was interested in the remarks of the Senator from Alabama. His view is a novel one, and I hope that I shall not be regarded as facetious when I attempt to show its application. He has pointed the way by which languishing industries may be benefited. He has announced, as I understand his view, a policy of internal or domestic tariffs—that any industry may receive relief against a competing industry in the United States by levying a tax upon the offending competitive industry. To illustrate: In my State we produce a superior quality of apples. Because of the drought many of the orchards have not yielded abundantly and the owners have suffered losses. I am told that the diminishing production of apples has resulted in an increase in the consumption of California oranges.

Under the Senator's view we should improve the condition of the apple growers of Utah by restricting, by excise tax or internal tariff regulation, the importation into Utah of California oranges. Under this policy the apple growers of Utah would compel higher prices for their reduced production. If the Senator's amendment prevails I would be warranted in offering an amendment to provide for a sort of compensatory tax upon oranges to replenish the purses of the apple growers.

May I suggest that Utah is a large producer of copper. In the construction of cables for the carrying of electric energy, large quantities of copper have been required. Recently, I am advised, aluminum has become a competitor with copper, and cables which are constructed to carry electric energy are composed in part at least, of aluminum. Copper a number of years ago sold for from 10 to 15 cents per pound. Recently it has been as low as 5 cents per pound. If more aluminum is used in the construction of power lines, obviously the demand for copper will be reduced.

Under the Senator's theory we are warranted in imposing a tariff upon aluminum in order to increase the price of copper and thus give employment to a large number of persons who were employed for years in the mining and reduction of copper ores.

Mr. President, this is a beautiful theory. But, speaking seriously, the proposition made by the Senator from Alabama, if carried into effect, would mean to array one industry against another, to balance the benefits and losses derived from the various industries of the United States. It would result in controversies, sectional and geographic. It would array industry against industry and produce most unfortunate results. It is impracticable, unsound, and I am sure will find no support here or elsewhere.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, in spite of my unlimited respect and affection for the eminent Senator from Alabama, I am compelled to appeal to the friends of the bill to vote against the proposed amendment. Regardless of its merits or demerits, its adoption would certainly make it impossible to pass the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. NEELY. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Was the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama considered by the committee?

Mr. NEELY. It was not. The committee never heard of it until the Senator from Alabama read it a moment ago.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may we have the amendment read again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment again.

The legislative clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I should like to submit an inquiry to the author of the amendment. During the past few years oil has sold as low as 11 cents a barrel. In my State it was as low as 18 cents a barrel and in Texas as low as 3 cents a barrel. That is all the producer received for the oil when it was sold.

I should like to ask the author of the amendment how the producer, receiving 3 cents a barrel, or 5 cents a barrel, or 11 cents a barrel, or even 18 cents a barrel, could pay 25 cents a barrel tax as the amendment proposes?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator shows absolutely the necessity for the protection of coal when people will proceed with the indiscriminate and unbusinesslike and wasteful procedure of producing oil at less than cost and selling it in competition with this great industry which employs half a million men. I do not know at what price oil formerly sold, but the amendment now pending would merely provide for a compensating tax on oil to equalize the increased cost in the production of coal.

There is a demand for so much coal. There is a demand for so much oil. Considered territorially, they come into competition. The fact that oil has been selling cheaper as the result, I assert, of cutthroat competition, has caused oil to displace millions of tons of coal and has deprived of work several hundred thousand coal diggers, who are waiting in their homes for normal conditions to return in the coal business.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, in addition to producing oil, my State produces coal. We have practically unlimited coal fields in Oklahoma, and while oil has been selling for a very low figure per barrel, coal has been selling, comparatively, just about as low.

In Oklahoma we have something like 30,000 wells which produce less than 5 barrels each per day. If the amendment should prevail, someone would have to make a catalog and check up those wells to ascertain which wells would have to pay a tax and which would not have to pay a tax.

Inasmuch as the amendment has had no consideration and its effects are not known either upon oil or coal, I cannot conceive of the Senate, upon a mere reading of the amendment and after a few minutes' discussion, with no facts before it, adopting such an amendment. I hope the Senate will refuse its approval of the amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to second what my colleague has said. I cannot imagine the Senate rushing into such an important matter of legislation with no information at all upon the subject, unless, indeed, the Senate prefers darkness to light.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think it would be a good thing to provide for external tariffs and internal tariffs, and when one industry becomes a little more prosperous than another, to impose an internal tariff or excise duty in order to lift up the one which is depressed?

Mr. GORE. That is on a par with an old Greek practice. Procrustes, a Greek highwayman, made it a rule to torture his victims. He had a bed of torture still known in mythology as the "procrustean bed." If his victims were shorter than this arbitrary standard, they were stretched until they fitted the bed. If they happened to be longer than the standard, they were pared down until they fitted. That seems to be the philosophy back of this amendment.

The mere matter of a tax of 21 cents per barrel on oil which 3 years ago was selling at 10 cents per barrel is to be slapped on or slapped off as inconsiderably as a group of children playing the old game of "club fist"—"take it off or knock it off." Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this is a strange situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if the Senator desires to discuss the amendment, I shall withdraw the motion temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to lay on the table is temporarily withdrawn.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this is an extraordinary situation. Less than 10,000 men in the United States have finally secured possession or control of practically all the natural resources of the United States—coal, iron, oil, aluminum, and so forth. All of God's great gifts to the human family have now finally drifted into the control of 5,000 to 10,000 people. The rest of the world is about to be placed in a position where it will be compelled to ask permission of these people to utilize the natural resources which were intended for their benefit, and utilize them at a price to be fixed by those who now own or control them. No more perfect form of economic slavery could be devised.

We have reached the point where the possessors of the natural resources are beginning to have trouble among themselves. They want a tax laid here and laid there for the purpose of enabling them to control or conduct their business successfully. The controversy next arises as to how we are going to distribute the taxing power among those who own the natural resources so as to enable them to conduct their business successfully.

Mr. President, the second point is that those who own the natural resources of the United States are constantly asking for power to fix the prices they shall charge the American people for using them. After having taken possession of or gathered to themselves the wealth of the United States in its natural resources, they are constantly coming to the Congress and asking for power to sit around a table and fix the prices which they shall charge the people for the use of such natural resources. Every bill that comes before this body dealing with that subject in some way or other undertakes to delegate power to these people to fix the price of the thing which they have to sell.

The situation is rapidly approaching a crisis. We are apparently facing a catastrophe. It was stated a few days ago by one in position to know that 80 percent of the human family is living below the poverty line. We have millions on relief, and millions more living on a low standard, while a vast portion of the people are unable to secure what a decent standard calls for. Those who have the world's wealth are seeking governmental power to fix prices for the millions.

Mr. President, in my opinion, we have reached the time when we ought to curtail the power of these people to fix prices. If we are going to fix prices, if we have reached the point where that must be done, let not those who own the natural resources fix the prices, but let the Government of the United States itself fix the prices. That is the only way by which we can protect the masses in this country. I do not believe in governmental price fixing, but I say to those who are urging price fixing by private interests, "You are driving toward Government price fixing."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator has examined the bill with his usual care in the consideration of legislation. Is it not a bill to fix prices?

Mr. BORAH. I am not prepared to say that it is.

Mr. KING. Will not the effect of it, from the interpretation which will be placed upon it, be to fix prices?

Mr. BORAH. I think as the bill has been amended the power to fix prices has been greatly modified.

Mr. KING. I wish I could share that view.

Mr. BORAH. If I am in error in that respect, I should like to be corrected.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator think any bill which authorizes any commission or governmental authority to fix wages and hours necessarily involves the power to fix prices? When authority is given to fix the major element of cost which the price must cover, is not that tantamount to conferring authority to fix prices themselves?

Mr. BORAH. I think an argument may be made in favor of that contention.

Mr. GORE. I should like to know whether the Senator does not think the Guffey bill falls within the four walls laid down by the Supreme Court in the Schechter case.

Mr. BORAH. I shall record my views on that question when I vote on the bill. I do not desire to answer the question without going into detail in support of my opinion.

Mr. GORE. Very well. If the Senator's views on the subject are confidential, I should not want him to divulge them prematurely, although I may say that they would be interesting and illuminating to the Senate and to the country.

Mr. President, with most of the conclusions just stated by the Senator from Idaho I concur; but I do not understand that the proprietors of the coal mines are insisting upon this proposed legislation. I do not know. If they are, I am not so advised.

So far as my own State is concerned—and it is engaged, on a limited scale, in mining coal—the owners and operators in that region are opposed to the pending legislation. They had some experience under the recent N. R. A. Act; and it is their conviction, as a result of their experience under that law, that Oklahoma and its environs suffered a loss of some 6,000,000 tons of coal annually in their output. Their market was curtailed to that extent. Markets which they had previously supplied were withdrawn from them and turned over to mines situated in other sections.

I do not mean that that was done intentionally, as a matter of design to injure the mines in Oklahoma. I doubt that. I do not mean that it was done in order to favor the mines in other sections. It was perhaps one of the unforeseen byproducts of any effort to control natural economic forces by arbitrary enactments or by arbitrary rules and regulations.

Human foresight and human wisdom are not equal to the task of anticipating these consequences. For that reason, economic legislation and tinkering of this character generally results in more mischief than good. That is almost inevitable. When it does not it is a matter of accident and a matter of chance. These interests are too serious to be committed to the vicissitudes of chance and haphazard fortune.

I feel certain that however the coal operators in other regions may feel toward this proposed legislation, the coal operators in my own State are not favorable to it. The coal miners themselves will be less interested when they learn that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], the author of this bill, stated on the floor of the Senate yesterday that it would not increase the wages of the miners. If the miners, if the wage earners are not to profit, then who is to profit by this revolution in the coal industry? Is it the coal operators in Pennsylvania and West Virginia alone? And so far as the oil business is concerned, the proposed tax of 21 cents a barrel on petroleum is not only unprecedented—it is unheard of. It is revolutionary and would be confiscatory.

This amendment shows that there is still some ingenuity among the sons of men, especially Senators, and that there are more mischiefs, "Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy." This amendment is flashed upon us in the twinkling of an eye, without a moment's notice. It affects the third or fourth largest industry in the United States, in which are embarked billions of dollars—an industry which is not controlled exclusively by big interests. There are hundreds of small oil companies in the country which have been invited to come into existence, to invest their capital in the industry upon the basis of the antitrust legislation by Congress. They were invited to embark their capital, their time, and their talents in the business. They have accepted that invitation; they have accepted it in good faith; and here, without a moment's notice, we undertake to impose a tax upon them without any hearing, without any notice, without any calculation as to consequences.

Of all the industries in the country during the depth of this depression, oil perhaps suffered more than any other; unless, indeed, it is the soft-coal industry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. GORE. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think possibly the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] desires to be heard on the amendment itself. I therefore withdraw the motion to table. But before I sit down I should like to observe that 3 years ago oil was selling at 10 cents a barrel. The Government has done what it could to resuscitate the oil industry, and oil is now selling at about $1 a barrel. But when it was selling at 10 cents a barrel this tax of 21 cents a barrel would have been a tax of 200 percent—a little excessive, approaching the point of diminishing returns, and even now it would be a tax of more than 20 percent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma withdraws his motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CONNALLY obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The amendment now pending is the one offered by the Senator from Alabama?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I want the Senate to know just what the amendment of the Senator from Alabama proposes to do, not to Texas, not to the people who produce oil, but to you the people who consume oil.

Eighty-five percent of the oil produced in my State is consumed in other States of the Union, and whatever is imposed as a tax on oil will, in large measure, be transferred as a tax on the people in other States who consume the oil. The Senator from Alabama proposes to levy a tax of one-half a cent per gallon on oil. A barrel of oil contains 42 gallons. That means that he proposes to levy a tax of 21 cents on every barrel of oil that is produced. Oil is selling for a dollar per barrel. In other words, it would be imposing a consumption tax of 21 cents per barrel on every barrel of oil produced.

What is the purpose? Is it to raise revenue to support the Government? It would produce revenue; but that is not its purpose. The purpose of the amendment is to make oil cost the people more so that instead of buying oil they will buy coal. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Is that a proper exercise of the taxing power of the Government? The Constitution gives Congress the power to raise revenue to enable the Government to perform its normal and proper functions. We have here an open, a brazen, a deliberate attempt to employ the taxing power of the Government to put a burden on one industry in order to help another industry. Is that Democratic doctrine? Is not that at variance with every platform pronouncement our party has made throughout its history?

I desire Senators to note, however, that the consumers of oil, the people who burn gasoline in their cars, are going to have to pay a part of this tax. I do not want to be unfair; some of it possibly will be borne by the producers, as all taxes are, in a fashion, but most of it will come out of the consumers of oil.

Mr. President, it had not been my purpose to speak on the bill. I cannot and have not from the beginning intended to support this measure, but not because I do not want to help the coal industry. The bill will help the oil industry, for that matter. If I voted purely the selfish interests of my own State I would support the bill, because when coal is made to cost more the temptation is always present for consumers to use natural gas and oil. But I cannot support the bill and have not intended to support it, because I regard it as absolutely beyond the proper functions and the proper powers of the Federal Government.

If the Supreme Court ever said anything which it meant, it said it in the N. R. A. decision, when it held that the production of an article locally is absolutely beyond the control of the Federal Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Among the votes cast by me in this Chamber of which I shall always be proud was my vote originally against the N. R. A. when the law was first enacted.

Mr. President, I not only dissent from the view that the Federal Government has the power to go into the States and control local production or local manufacturing, but I dissent from the whole theory of the N. R. A. Act in this; and I dissent from that theory in this particular bill, that the Federal Government shall delegate its legislative power to a group of any particular industry and allow that industry in and of itself to constitute a lawmaking body and to enact rules and regulations for the government of an industry, no matter what the minority of that industry may desire, no matter what its interests may be, but superimpose upon that minority of an industry the burdens and the rules and the regulations adopted by the majority. That is not in keeping with our well-settled conceptions of constitutional government.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I entirely agree with the proposition just enunciated so ably and clearly by the Senator from Texas, but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill goes even beyond the statement which he has made, because it grants to a group composed of the producing class and the laboring class in one industry the control of the taxing power of the United States Government, vested in Congress under the Constitution of the United States, and permits them to use the taxing power of the United States Government, not for the purpose of raising revenue, which is the only just basis of taxation, but for the purpose of penalizing members of the industry who do not comply with the regulations set up by the authority established under the act.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from Missouri. Of course, the bill delegates the taxing power, just as it delegates the legislative power. Under the Constitution we can delegate neither power, because the people in their wisdom said in the Constitution that whatever power should be over taxation and whatever power should be over legislation should rest here in the Congress, and when they said that, they meant that it should rest nowhere else.

Mr. President, the power to make laws does not rest in the Executive, the President; it does not rest in the courts; the power to make laws does not exist in any group or any faction, but it rests in the Congress of the United States. It rests here because the Congress of the United States when it legislates and when it levies taxes is acting as the agent of the people themselves, and under that delegation by the people Congress and no one else must levy the taxes and must enact the laws.

Have Senators read the N. R. A. decision? Did Senators need to read the N. R. A. decision? There is nothing new in the N. R. A. decision. It is simply a review and a restatement of the decisions and judicial pronouncements coming down to us from the days of John Marshall himself.

It was a clarification of the application of those policies; I grant it applied more clearly to the particular facts of the Schechter case those prior existing fundamental policies and decisions, but it stated no new principle, it enunciated no new constitutional doctrine.

Mr. President, the pending bill proposes to sovietize particular industries. Russia, in its theory of social organization, permits particular groups, a laboring group here, an industrial group over there, and some other group in some other place, to form a soviet. That soviet is a law unto that particular industry or group. That is what the pending bill is undertaking to do with the coal industry of this country.

If it restricted itself to the coal industry, though I could not vote for it, I should not lift my voice here today against it, because I think that other Senators are as capable of passing upon this measure as I am myself; but when the authors of this measure undertake not only to sovietize the coal industry, but endeavor to put every other industry, which may by any spread of the imagination be a competitor, into the same strait-jacket in which they are putting the coal industry, I, as a representative of my great State, raise my voice most vigorously in protest against that measure.

Why do the sponsors of the bill desire to make oil cost the people more? Because they want to make it harder for them to buy oil so that they will therefore be forced to buy coal. Why not put a provision in the bill that no one shall buy any oil at all? It would be simpler, it would be easier, if we should make all buy coal. Insert a clause in the bill requiring every man who builds a fire, to get a Government license before he builds the fire, and promise to burn coal only. That would accomplish the purpose much more directly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I submit these remarks to the Senate in the hope that the Senate will vote down the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, my time on the amendment has expired, and I am now speaking on the bill. I have already spoken on the amendment, but I wish to make one or two further observations which bear on this amendment.

The Senator from Alabama has offered an amendment to the pending bill which proposes to levy a tax of 21 cents per barrel on petroleum. Petroleum and its products are already overtaxed. Let the record speak.

All the expenditures of all our various forms of government combined—National, State, county, city, township, and school district—our annual expenditures on all forms of government, amount to a little more than $14,000,000,000. A little less than $15,000,000,000 a year is the aggregate expenditure. Our aggregate taxes, our aggregate revenues collected by our various forms of government—national, State, and local—amount to considerably more than $9,000,000,000 per annum. A little less than $10,000,000,000 annually is our aggregate revenue.

There is a disparity, as will be seen, of something like $4,000,000,000. That is met, not by taxation, but by resort to credit—borrowing. Of the $9,000,000,000 and more of revenue raised year after year, gasoline alone pays one-twelfth. Of all the taxes, imposed by the Federal Government, by the 48 States, by 3,200 counties, and by the numberless cities, towns, townships, and school districts, gasoline pays one-twelfth of all our revenues. The Federal Government imposes several kinds of taxes—customs, excise, income, estate, excess profit. I believe it imposes customs duties on three or four thousand different articles. The 48 different States have several types of taxation—ad valorem, license, income, estate, inheritance. The various counties, more than 3,200, have different types of taxation. Thousands of cities have different types of taxation. Townships and school districts, thousands upon thousands, add tax upon tax. But when we aggregate all the taxes, all the revenues derived by every form of government from every source of taxation, amounting to more than $9,000,000,000 a year, one-twelfth of the whole is derived from gasoline alone.

There are various other taxes. My own State has a gross production tax of 5 percent on the oil. Other States have gross production taxes on the production of oil. Gasoline and the auxiliary taxes resulting from gasoline and its uses aggregate one and one-quarter billion dollars a year. I do not want the Government to gut the goose that lays the golden egg.

Now, in order to carry out some uneconomic scheme or dream violating the fundamental laws of economics—not alone violating the Constitution of the United States—violating the constitution of nature itself, violating the fundamental laws of economics, trying to play fast and loose with economic forces which are stronger than acts of Congress themselves, making toys out of reality, an amendment is brought in here by which without a moment's notice it is proposed to tax a great industry which is already taxed beyond endurance.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks a speech by Gen. Baird H. Markham on the taxation of gasoline, together with the statistical statement concerning Oklahoma and related matters, which I shall furnish the Secretary at a later date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

An opportunity to address the National Petroleum Association upon the subject of taxation is particularly appealing because your organization is deeply interested in the tax situation now confronting the petroleum industry. I feel certain my remarks will receive a ready response, for your organization has been one of the leading trade associations taking an active and aggressive part in the battle to protect this industry from further unfair taxation and unjust legislation.

Your association is to be complimented upon the stand it has taken and upon its far-sighted, able, and forceful leaders. For all of them I have the highest regard and esteem. Let me mention particularly the splendid work which your general counsel, Mr. Fayette B. Dow, has done on behalf of your association and of the industry. He is thoroughly acquainted with the many ramifications of the numerous problems confronting the industry. He has always rendered outstanding cooperation and support in efforts to protect and to relieve the industry from excessive taxation and discriminatory legislation. I wish to take this opportunity publicly to express to him, and for him, my sincere appreciation.

In this era of extravagant governmental expenditures and unreasonable tax demands, one of the paramount questions concerning us all as citizens and taxpayers is the mounting burden of taxation. The tax load has increased, and still is increasing, to such an extent that we must ask ourselves, "What price taxes?" When will we reach the point where no additional taxes will be imposed upon us? Will there come a time when taxpayers will receive some consideration at the hands of legislators? Will an effort be made to reduce the tax burden? When will government restore to us the right and the pleasure of spending our own money?

I fear that those highly desirable ends will not be reached until you and I, as citizens, take a more active interest in the affairs of government; until we demand of our legislators and public officials that they give at least as much consideration to ways and means of reducing taxes as currently they do to increasing expenditures. We must insist that they put at least as much emphasis upon cost as they do upon need, and that they remember that the fundamental reason why most of us try to earn our wages is not merely the support of the tax collector. It is becoming painfully obvious that if we do not take early and effective steps to reduce the cost of government, taxes increasingly will exact higher tolls from us and from our business. Eventually there will be incentive neither to work nor to engage in productive enterprise. Then, indeed, Government will be in control of all business, for other than Government there will be no business. Those of you who have given your lives to building up your enterprises may well consider seriously that threat.

The history of taxes which today affect the petroleum industry so adversely is not greatly different from that of any other taxes. Taxes usually have small beginnings and start with low rates. The natural tendency is for them to grow and multiply. Before the taxpayers fully are aware of the situation, taxes have become enormous burdens. By that time the taxpayers protest in vain, for those who levy taxes have had opportunity to conceive cogent reasons why tax reduction is impossible.

Taxes directly affecting the petroleum industry have increased and multiplied so rapidly that within comparatively a few years this industry has been placed in the unenviable position of bearing a highly disproportionate share of the cost of government. It matters not whether the taxes are paid directly by this industry or by its customers. Money that otherwise would be used for purchases must go to the tax collector. Truly the future economic welfare of this industry, which is linked with the welfare of the Nation as a whole, compels us to ask, "What price taxes?"

This question is particularly pertinent to those who have followed the course of thousands of tax, restrictive, and regulatory measures which have been introduced this year in the legislatures of 44 States and in Congress. Scarcely half the legislatures even yet have adjourned. Many of them will return for special sessions. Although the recovery of business has been the general desire, almost every conceivable type of legislation and taxation which would harry and harass this and other industries has been proposed. Only lip service has been rendered to the one great need—stimulation and restoration of trade activity.

No high degree of statesmanship is needed to advise business and industry to rid itself of its fears and to plunge into the maelstrom of untried ideas. The average business man, however, is more inclined to base his actions upon past experience than recklessly to heed the advice of those who have nothing to lose. In fact, their very words have been lost in the thunder of the hoofs of the four horsemen of disaster—politics, partisanship, patronage, and plunder.

The petroleum industry has been a shining target for sniping revenue hunters because it is commonly supposed to deal in liquid gold. In the past few years, however, oil has been liquid gold only to government, which has obtained more money by taxing petroleum products than has the industry which produces, refines, and markets them. Let me review this situation to establish in your minds beyond any question the truth of that statement.

The larger oil-producing States derive one-half, or more, of their total tax revenue through the petroleum industry. Taxes levied upon gasoline provide 20 to 60 percent of the total tax income of all the States. The average is 31.4 percent. About 12 percent of all Federal revenue is derived through, or from, this industry.

The industry's 1933 tax bill of $1,004,824,028 was equivalent to a tax of roundly $1,000 for every worker. In 1933 also taxes averaged $1.11 upon each barrel of crude oil, although the producing cost was only 80.6 cents and the average market price only 72 cents. In 1933 also petroleum taxes amounted to 429 percent of petroleum earnings. In other words, profits upon this industry's $12,000,000,000 capital investment were only one-fifth as large as the tax bill.

In 15 years the average retail price of gasoline has been cut squarely in half. During the same period, taxes upon gasoline have increased several thousand percent in rate and in cost. In 1924, for instance, 9 cents of every $1 the consumer paid for gasoline went to the tax collector. In 1933 the tax collector took 30 cents of every gasoline dollar.

Two taxes—Federal and State—are paid on each gallon of gasoline sold in every State. In some States the consumer pays four taxes on the same gallon—Federal, State, county, and municipal. During 1934 the Federal gasoline tax was 1 cent per gallon. State tax rates ranged from 2 cents to 7 cents per gallon. County tax rates were as high as 3 cents, and municipal taxes as high as 2 cents. Let me remind you that these are cumulative taxes which in no State totaled less than 3 cents per gallon, and in 1 State amounted to 12 cents per gallon.

The gasoline tax is, in effect, a retail sales tax upon motor fuel. Sales taxes on commodities seldom exceed 3 percent. The gasoline sales tax ranges from 20 to 120 percent. In 1934 it averaged nearly 40 percent. Lest some of you, even though you may be producers of gasoline, seek to calm your fears by saying that this tax is paid by the consumer, or by thinking that, after all, gasoline is a luxury, let me explain the changed status of gasoline.

The gasoline tax is paid by the consumer, but the higher the tax the less gasoline he can afford to buy. Impose a 4-cent tax upon 12-cent gasoline and you collect from the consumer in taxes on the first 3 gallons enough money to have financed the purchase of a fourth gallon.

Gasoline once was a luxury but, like the motor vehicle, has become one of the modern necessities of life. Today it is as essential as food and shelter. An important economic development of the depression has been the realization that gasoline is ranked among necessities. For proof I refer you to the economist and statistician, Leonard P. Ayres, who recently wrote:

"Gasoline consumption has been but little and only temporarily affected by the depression. Apparently it ranks in popular esteem ahead of other things that we have been accustomed to think of as being the foremost necessities."

Another interesting development of the depression has been the tenacity with which those facing the prospect of losing their all clung to the family automobile. Instead of being disposed of first, as an unnecessary luxury, it was the last possession to be relinquished. In other words, the average worker realized that which others, particularly government, overlooked—to be without a motor vehicle is equivalent to economic isolation. The motor vehicle has become the link between the family and the job. Add to that fact the additional fact that 1 in every 6 workers engaged in wholesale trades in the United States today depend for their livelihood upon the petroleum and automotive industries, and you can visualize how quickly excessive taxation of these industries and their products can throttle economic recovery.

Lest you believe this is merely theory, let me point out that we are definitely headed in that direction. Total taxes on a small new car the first year amount to more than $60, or better than 10 percent of its cost. Of this amount, nearly $30 represent taxes upon fuels and lubricants. Few homes in this country are taxed as much as 5 percent of their value yearly, yet the value of motor-vehicle property is extinguished by taxation every 4 years. The annual payments of motor-vehicle owners represent, roundly, 28 percent of the average value of their cars.

Gasoline taxes, on a per vehicle basis, have increased more than 22,500 percent in 16 years. Registration fees have risen about 55 percent in the same period. In 1919, the first year of gasoline taxation, the average annual cost to the consumer was about 18 cents. The average registration fee was just under $10. Last year the average registration fee was just over $12, while the average cost of gasoline taxes was nearly $32. In recent years there has been no drastic increase in registration fees, while gasoline taxes, if continued at present trends, would exceed $300 per car by 1943. Truly, we may ask, "What price taxes?"

Not only is State government reaching into the consumer's pocket for gasoline-tax money, but the Federal Government also has entered the competition. Taxes upon gasoline and lubricating oil supplied more than 70 percent of the Federal Government's income from automotive-tax sources in the last fiscal year. Naturally, there has been a direct effect upon the income of the States. During the first year of this Federal tax, State gasoline-tax receipts slumped $23,000,000, the first decline in the history of gasoline taxation in this country.

The States have resented the imposition of this duplicating tax by the Federal Government. The Senate Finance Committee and other congressional committees have recommended that it be eliminated. Some 250 organizations, representing millions of taxpayers, have joined with 21 States in petitioning Congress for its repeal. It is due to expire on June 30 next, and it would be the course of wisdom for the petroleum industry aggressively to continue its battle for repeal of the levy.

You may find it advisable to heed the warning that Congressmen who subscribe to the expensive principle of never giving the taxpayer a break will shortly become vociferously vocal against the elimination of this levy. I have little doubt that within the next few weeks you will be warned from Washington that only catastrophe could attend the elimination of the Federal gasoline tax. Federal contributions to highways in past year will be stressed to the point of overemphasis, but it is probable that little will be said concerning the highway users' contributions to the Federal Government. Even a hasty review of the financial record will show that since 1918 the Federal Government has collected from the highway user some $90,000,000 more in special taxes than has been expended in regular Federal-aid payments to roads. Brief study will reveal also that while the Federal Government has insisted upon taxing highway users because it builds highways for their use, it has levied no such special additional taxes upon those for whom it builds canals and improves rivers, establishes coast-guard and lighthouse service, and otherwise helps.

While we are on the subject of gasoline taxation, I should like to take the time to mention a few ghosts which usually start to walk just about the time legislative bodies begin their search for logical reasons why taxes should not be reduced. These ghosts are composed of such theories as that the highway user should pay for all highways, that gasoline taxes build good roads and consequently tend to increase gasoline consumption, and that whatever the gasoline-tax rate the petroleum industry cannot suffer because of improved business conditions resulting from good roads.

I ask you seriously to consider these facts. Gasoline taxes, because of high rates, definitely and permanently prohibit any substantial improvement in gasoline prices, and therefore in this industry's earnings. Because of gasoline tax evasion, market prices constantly are being forced to lower levels, and the heavier the tax the more extensive the evasion and the more serious the price situation.

The cost to the industry of gasoline tax collection, estimated at $22,500,000 a year, imposes new responsibilities and further burdens upon our business. The use of gasoline tax revenues for purposes other than highways places the consumer-taxpayer in the position of paying twice for the same governmental services, and definitely prevents this industry from increasing its sales. By financing unnecessarily expensive highways, excessive gasoline rates unduly burden the taxpayer and build up sales resistance against this industry's products. Failure to observe economic laws, and to enforce State laws, tends to offset any possible benefits to be expected from taxing this industry's principal income product. I ask again, "What price taxes?"

The idea of building for this country the finest highway system in the world never has progressed beyond the picture stage. Highway users have paid in taxes more than enough to improve every mile of road in the United States, yet barely one-third of the highway mileage today bears witness to the effective expenditure of highway funds. Verily the four horsemen of disaster have traveled these roads. It is estimated that in 1933 alone more than $100,000,000 of gasoline-tax money paid for roads was used for other purposes.

The petroleum industry, committed to reasonable taxation of gasoline for the specific purpose of constructing, improving, and maintaining highways, cannot do other than oppose such diversion of road funds. Politicians may plead the need of balanced budgets, emergency funds, unemployment relief, and what not, but the prior and legal commitment of gasoline-tax money is exclusively to highways.

I have already indicated that this industry, at an expense of more than $22,500,000 a year, pays more than 80 percent of the cost of gasoline-tax collection. That figure does not include the money spent by this industry in aiding government to enforce gasoline-tax laws and to prevent bootlegging, tax evasion, and substitution; it does not include the cost of supplying trained men to augment the work of undermanned collecting agencies, of establishing land and water patrols, of prosecution of violations of gasoline-tax laws, and of other services.

The subject of excessive taxation inevitably leads to the subject of inimical legislation, which currently is as serious a menace. Few of the proposed measures designed to restrict and to regulate the use of highways can be considered as other than inimical to the interests of this industry. Thousands of such bills have been introduced this year alone by interests unfriendly to motor transportation. It is probable that never before has the American public been faced with such extensive and powerful opposition to its own free use of its own highways.

This is a peculiar situation, in view of the fact that the highway user is paying so dearly both for highways and for government. For instance, in New York State the recent increase in gasoline taxation will make the average per capita tax of the highway user $73.75 per year, as compared with a per capita tax of $23.75 for the average nonmotorist citizen. Since only a fraction of the highway user's tax payments is used for highways, he actually pays taxes for the general support of government two and one-half times as great as those paid by the average nonmotorist citizen.

There are some who assert that business motor vehicles are not paying their way. We can turn to Georgia for an example of what is being done along this line. In Georgia a 1½-ton truck pays annual taxes of more than $1,600, while a 4-ton truck and trailer is taxed nearly $3,500. These are special taxes paid in addition to all others. In fact, all motor-vehicle taxes are special additional taxes, a fact often overlooked by those who forget that the motor-vehicle owner is also a citizen.

We need not confine our attention to highway taxation, however, to find examples of uneconomic and un-American excesses. A trend in discriminatory taxation which threatens adversely to affect the petroleum industry to an alarming degree is the spread of chain-store taxes to bulk plants and service stations. In some cases these taxes virtually amount to confiscation. Consider the situation in West Virginia, where the petroleum industry in 1933 did an annual business of $15,000,000 and paid chain-store taxes totaling $481,168. Retailers of general commodities, doing an annual business of $75,000,000, paid chain-store taxes of only $60,785. In other words, the petroleum industry paid 88.7 percent of the chain-store tax bill for the privilege of doing 16.6 percent of the business. Service stations constituted only 29.2 percent of West Virginia's retail establishments in 1933, but paid 85.3 percent of the chain-store tax.

Let me point out that while this situation may exist only in West Virginia and a few other States today, it may spread to other States tomorrow. The attitude of State legislatures during the 1935 sessions clearly indicates that trend. It was not with the expectation of such treatment that petroleum marketers established service stations to provide the public with courteous and efficient service available from no other source. But while the larger proportion of service-station activity may be free service, the possibilities of revenue are too great for legislatures to overlook.

To consider the tax burden this industry already has been called upon to bear is to raise a question as to whether it is the deliberate intention of government to put it out of business. I am inclined to believe that government has not realized what it is doing to this industry. You may recall that Tacitus, the Roman historian, in analyzing the situation in his day, remarked that "when the state is most corrupt, then laws are not multiplied." We can paraphrase that statement in considering the situation today by saying: "When the government is run in the interests of politicians, then taxes are most multiplied." Yet we must not forget that whatever the purpose of government may be, excessive taxation is no less alarming because the desired end was something other than destruction.

Various other legislative efforts have as their effect, if not their intent, the further handicapping of this industry. There is legislation designed to compel motorists to use alcohol blends instead of straight gasoline fuel. Here we have the alcohol industry sniping for our biggest market under the masquerade of farm relief. There is a proposal to impose a Federal tax upon fuel oil, an outright attempt to benefit the coal industry at our expense. There are many other instances of legislation and taxation which would have the ultimate effect of usurping the right of this industry to do business on a fair and equitable basis.

I think I violate no confidences and perhaps I tell you no news when I say that this industry is surrounded by besiegers adept in practical politics, motivated largely by greed, and heedless both of private right and of public welfare. They are not concerned with the fact that this great American industry created its own field of activity and, until recently, at least, established markets of its own instead of invading those of others. They are unappreciative of the service this industry has rendered to the public and to the country. They are unmindful of the fact that this is an essential industry which serves every other industry, and upon whose welfare every other industry is dependent.

I am not an alarmist, but if I have read the pages of history correctly this industry must fight its own battles if it would preserve its rights and its independence. If I read the pages of history correctly, the downfall of virtually every great nation had its start directly or indirectly in excessive taxation. It is a fixed principle of economics that discriminatory burdens of any kind cannot be placed upon any essential industry without unbalancing the entire business system.

I say to you in all frankness that we must repel these attacks and relieve ourselves of an unduly heavy burden of taxation.

This industry has rendered to the public efficient and unending service of which it can be justly proud. This industry need fear no informed public opinion. American citizens are fair when they know the facts. But we must take effective steps to inform and enlighten opinion. We must continuously devote efforts to education lest public misunderstanding permit this industry to be sacrificed on the altar of political expediency.

I am convinced that neither the present unfortunate tax situation, nor future danger of destruction of this industry by any agency, could materialize were the petroleum industry to take advantage of its favorably strategic position to promote public understanding. Nearly one-fourth of all the citizens of this country, the motorists, are in contact with this industry through its service stations every day in the year. These citizens constitute for 3 to 5 minutes, every time they drive into a service station, a listening audience. They should be given some information other than the current price of gasoline and the prospects of changes in the weather. The least they could be told is the difference between price and cost as represented by taxes, and I am inclined to believe they would react by showing great good will toward an industry which expresses its concern over the taxes that drain money from their pockets. Such efforts constitute economical and effective means of guiding and enlightening public opinion.

I urge you, as citizens and as oil men earnestly desirous of seeing your Nation and your industry restored to prosperity, to do everything within your power to promote the principles of equitable taxation and industrial justice. You cannot escape the duty of waging unceasing war upon those factors and those interests which would destroy an industry dealing in an essential commodity which constitutes the industrial lifeblood of America.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it will appear elsewhere in the RECORD that I promised the people of Oklahoma in 1916 that I would oppose the United States entering the World War and that I kept my promise, although it cost me my seat in the United States Senate. That record gives proof that I try at least to keep my promises. In my last race for the Senate (1930) I made the people of Oklahoma just three promises in just six words:

"LESS TAXES, MORE TRADE, NO TRUSTS"

I have stood by those promises and I still believe that those promises if carried out would constitute a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night leading us out of this depression. They control and they explain my votes. Four tax measures have passed Congress since my return to the Senate. I did not vote for them. I could not vote for them without violating my promise to the people—less taxes, not more taxes.

THE POWER TO TAX IS THE POWER TO DESTROY

I did not vote for the tax bill which has just passed, although I favored certain of its provisions. I had secured two amendments important to Oklahoma. I therefore paired on the bill. In season and out, I stand on the declaration contained in the national Democratic platform for "a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay." That tax bill, it has been said, was passed to compel the rich to bear their share of our governmental expenses. They should bear their share, their full share. But viewed in that light the bill reveals one tragic truth to which no one should close his eyes. It will raise about $250,000,000 a year. That is the added burden placed on the rich—that is their allotted share. It will raise enough money to pay our expenses at current rates for less than 10 days. If the Government should take each and every income in the United States in excess of $50,000 a year—should take the total incomes instead of a mere tax on such incomes—it would pay current running expenses for less than 5 weeks. For every dollar of taxes it takes in, it borrows another dollar—and spends both. The Federal Government is now spending more than $28,000,000 a day—more than a million dollars an hour—more than $10,000,000,000 a year. Here is the question that appalls me. Who are to pay our expenses for the remaining 355 days in the year? If that completes the quota which the rich are to pay, who will pay the rest? The middle class, the producer, the consumer, the farmer, the wage earner? Alexander Hamilton spoke the grim truth when he said that the Government must get its revenue out of the backs and bellies of the people.

Why, the present Federal tax of 1 cent a gallon on gasoline and lubricating oil alone raises $200,000,000 a year. I fought the Federal tax on gasoline. I thought that resource should be reserved to the States. Besides, when the oil industry is overtaxed Oklahoma is overburdened. But, if I had voted for all these big appropriations, I would have voted for all these tax bills, but I have not. Witness the fact that I introduced Concurrent Resolution No. 23, creating a joint committee of the two Houses to prepare and recommend a plan to reduce our expenses and revise our tax laws so as to bring revenues and expenditures into balance. When that task is undertaken, and I see signs now, I will go as far and as fast as prudence and sound public policy will permit. Sooner or later that task must be undertaken and must be performed or disaster will "follow fast and follow faster." I was one of those who voted against the big $4,800,000,000 bill. Pay day stares at us like a red light in a death's head—warning us that your children and mine will have to pay these bonds. Shall we leave them no legacy but debts—no keepsakes but chains?

OKLAHOMANS SHOULD COMPARE THEIR STRENGTH AND THEIR BURDENS

Oklahoma has 2,500,000 inhabitants. It has, including school districts, 6,353 governmental units vested with the power to tax and with the power to create debts. On the average this is 1 taxing unit for every 11 square miles of territory and every 397 inhabitants. Is it any wonder that the taxpayer is bleeding at every pore? "An unnecessary tax is an unjust tax." (Democratic national platform, 1884.)

The assessed valuation of all taxable property in the State is $1,258,000,000. (Our tax rolls do not list mineral properties.)

Oklahoma's corporate and individual debts aggregate $1,500,000,000. To this must be added State and local debts, $240,000,000, plus Oklahoma's share of the national debt, approximating $600,000,000. The grand total is $2,340,000,000—nearly $1,000 per capita, $4,000 per family. The interest on that amount will approximate $100,000,000 a year.

Oklahoma's total tax levies, including special taxes, for the fiscal year 1935 amounted to $101,000,000. Oklahoma's share of Federal taxes for the fiscal year 1935 amounted to $76,000,000. The two combined equal $177,000,000—$70 per capita, or $300 per family—that much cash out of pocket each year.

It must be borne in mind that Federal expenditures last year largely exceeded Federal revenues. The difference is met out of borrowings. Oklahoma's share of Federal expenditures for the last fiscal year amounted to $136,000,000 and her share for the current fiscal year amounts to $205,000,000.

Oklahoma, in addition to these governmental expenses, pays railway freight charges approximating $60,000,000 a year.

Oklahoma pays annually fire, life, and casualty insurance premiums approximating $50,000,000.

Under the Social Security law just enacted Oklahoma will be required to pay $38,000,000 in 1937, $45,000,000 in 1945, and $56,000,000 in 1950. But, excluding that item and including only taxes, interest, freight charges, and insurance premiums, we have current carrying charges totaling $387,000,000—$154 per capita, more than $600 per family per annum.

To summarize, Oklahoma's share of all taxes, national, State, and local, for the last fiscal year aggregated $177,000,000, and her share of all national, State, and local expenses for the fiscal year 1935 aggregate $237,000,000. The latter item for the current fiscal year amounts to $306,000,000.

What about our strength? What about our resources? What about our income? Take the two chief sources, agriculture and petroleum:

Our farmers in 1934 received from the sale of farm products, including livestock, $109,000,000, to which should be added $26,000,000 for rental and benefit payments.

The producers of oil received last year $183,000,000.

It thus appears from the foregoing figures that all the farm products, including livestock, marketed in the State in 1934 lacked $68,000,000 of bringing enough to pay our total tax bill. And all the petroleum marketed in the State last year brought only $6,000,000 more than enough to pay the total tax bill. The aggregate receipts from all such agricultural products and petroleum combined for the last fiscal year lacked $14,000,000 of bringing enough to pay our total governmental expenditures for the current fiscal year.

To complete the record it should be added that the Brookings Institute estimates the total wealth of Oklahoma for 1933 at $3,500,000,000 and the total income of her people at $608,000,000. The income of the Government must, in the long run, be taken out of the incomes of the people. Out of every $3 of income the taxpayer today parts with $1 to pay some form of Government expense. Our income per family in 1934 was $1,587. Our public debts, not including private debts, per family was $1,663.

The foregoing figures shed a lurid light on the disproportion between our strength and our burden. Viewed in this light the people can appreciate the concern which I feel over the increasing weight of our multiplying tax burdens—why I want to take the ax out of tax—why I fear that we are forging chains for our children which they will have to bear or will have to break—why I approved the stand of Speaker "Red" Phillips and his legislative "mill boys" for low taxes against high taxes, for economy against extravagance, for experience against experiments—why I think that the taxpayer is the forgotten man. Let others glory in voting additional taxes, in adding to the taxpayer's burden. For my part I am unwilling to raise taxes until we are ready to reduce expenses and thus bring revenues and expenditures into balance. Then count me in. I will then discharge that duty and meet that responsibility. An unbalanced Budget is a standing invitation to repudiation, inflation, and bankruptcy—"three in one." Confidence is the life of business. Confidence is indispensable to recovery.

Mr. President, I ask permission to print in the RECORD an address made by me before the Forty-eighth Annual Convention of the American Federation of Labor, at New Orleans, La.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOVEMBER 21, 1928.

President GREEN. We have a very distinguished visitor with us this afternoon, a great friend of labor, a man who has always supported labor's worthy program, and has always stood behind us in supporting labor in the achievement of its laudable purpose. Most of you know our visitor by reputation, many of you know him personally. He is here for just a short time and has come over to extend a word of greeting to the friends of labor. I esteem it a privilege to be able to present to you Hon. THOMAS P. GORE, ex-Senator from Oklahoma.

ADDRESS BY THOMAS P. GORE

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, friends and fellow citizens, I am deeply sensible of the high compliment implied in this invitation, and I realize it is a compliment coming from the heart. * * *

I do not believe the wit and wisdom of man has yet devised a better way to judge the tree than by its fruit. Organized labor welcomes a judgment by that supreme, that divine test. Judged by that standard, organized labor can withstand the severest judgment at the bar of history, at the bar of economics, and at the bar of ethics. Contrast the present age with any cross section of human history in the days that are gone—50 years, 100 years, 500 years ago, and we witness constant and continuous progress; but this progress has not been spontaneous, it represents infinite toil, thought, self-denial, and sacrifice.

Take a cross section 500 years ago. As I remember—our distinguished English guests will correct me if I am wrong—the black plague occurred about 1348. From one-fourth to one-third of the laboring men of England perished in that terrible plague. With the diminished supply of labor, wages tended to rise, and immediately after this catastrophe the British Parliament embarked upon that centuries-old effort to regulate wages. The time came when wages were fixed by the justices of the peace; I believe that policy was not discontinued until about 1814 or 1815, and then it was discontinued, not because of the efforts of labor, but in the interest of capital because the wages were too high.

Organized labor is responsible for three great achievements in behalf of labor, every one of which justifies your history and your sacrifices. The first is the effort to secure a reasonable wage, a living wage, in return for your efforts and your toil. Second is the effort to secure more reasonable hours. Time was when the laborer's day extended from sunrise to sunset, from the daylight to the dark, when men were little more than dumb, driven slaves. This emancipation is to the credit—I hope I am not extravagant when I say—to the glory of organized labor.

Still another achievement which justified your existence is the improvement in the condition, not only of men—that in itself would be enough to justify your existence—but the still greater achievement in securing better working conditions for women and for the younger laborers. The emancipation of men in this respect is due to justice; the emancipation of women, not only to justice, but to humanity. Both of these achievements justify your existence.

Your efforts are not concluded. Organized labor will never be obliged to weep, like Alexander of old, for other worlds to conquer. Your efforts in the past have not been limited to the service of labor alone. You have served not only humanity, you have served the Republic. The limitation of immigration must be set down, at least in part, and largely, to the intelligent and well-guided efforts of organized labor, a more selective process in the choice of those who come from abroad to cast their fortunes among us and to assist us in making this Republic justify the highest aspirations of its founders.

Not only that, to the credit of labor in large part is due the establishment of one of America's distinguished and distinguishing institutions. The American free school is largely due to the efforts, to the education and agitation carried on by organized labor in the early part of our national life. You deserve more credit for this achievement than you have actually claimed or enjoyed. That alone justifies your history and your existence.

As I suggested, organized labor will never be obliged to weep, like Alexander of old, for other worlds to conquer. Your past achievements may possibly loom large upon the background of history, but there are always new forces, there are changing forces, in our social and industrial organization which require intelligent thought and intelligent guidance. And in this department of our national life American labor will find much, if not most, of its field of endeavor in the years—I will say in the centuries that are to come, because labor is a century plant; it is not destined to die, it is destined to survive and to continue its beneficent services as exigencies, as the changing circumstances of our national life, may require, under the guidance of such men as President Green, Secretary Morrison, and their cabinet. With their aid labor will enjoy, as it is entitled to enjoy, the finest fruits of your collective talents and your collective labors. Labor has never defaulted, and in the future I am sure it will raise our Republic into the rich light of another day.

President GREEN, I wish that Senator GORE might understand how deeply we appreciate his visit and the splendid address he delivered this afternoon. His address will be a part of the printed proceedings of our convention. I am sure we can read it at our leisure, and we can be very greatly profited by analyzing carefully the historic review he made of the development of labor. We want Senator GORE to know that he occupies a very large place in the hearts and affections of the working men and women of this country. We know how he championed our cause whenever opportunity presented itself when he was a Member of the United States Senate. We are grateful for all he did for us during his official career, and we want him to know that he is always welcome at a convention of the American Federation of Labor.

Delegate TIGHE. I move that this convention give to ex-Senator GORE a vote of thanks for his address to us this afternoon.

The motion was seconded and adopted by unanimous vote.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I renew my motion to lay the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] on the table.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to perfect my amendment by——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma renew his motion to lay on the table?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understood him to withdraw that motion.

Mr. GORE. No; I renewed it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. The Chair is trying to discover the present parliamentary situation.

Mr. GORE. I did renew the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, has the Senator from Alabama offered an amendment to his first proposal?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama has offered an amendment to the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that. I thought he had offered a modification of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There has been no modification of the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was trying to modify my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has made a motion to lay the amendment on the table, and under the rules of the Senate the Senator can make no modification of his amendment so long as that motion is pending.

Mr. McNARY. Of course that is rather a crude way of proceeding. I should think the Senator from Oklahoma would be willing for the Senator from Alabama to perfect his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is a matter of agreement.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, yes.

Mr. KING. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Lewis	Robinson

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

S. 946. An act to amend sections 3 and 4 of the act of July 3, 1930, entitled "An act for the rehabilitation of the Bitter Root irrigation project, Montana";

S. 3184. An act to provide for the immediate settlement of the obligation of the Joe Graham Post of the American Legion arising out of the purchase of the Ship Island Military Reservation; and

S. 3374. An act for the relief of the State of Indiana.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2521) amending section 5 of Public Law No. 264, Seventy-third Congress, approved May 29, 1934, relative to the appointment of Naval Academy graduates as ensigns in the Navy, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8587) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 7678) to authorize the Director of the Mint to supplement the approved design of the 50-cent piece commemorating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Daniel Boone, the coinage of which was authorized by act of the Seventy-third Congress (Public, No. 258, S. 3355), in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 3019. An act to amend "An act to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes", approved June 28, 1934 (48 Stat. 1269);

H. R. 6732. An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes;

H. R. 7199. An act to provide for the donation of certain Army equipment to posts of the Veterans of Foreign Wars;

H. R. 7709. An act to provide time credits for substitute laborers in the Post Office when appointed as regular laborers;

H. R. 8632. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River, to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley, to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley, to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933; and

H. R. 8651. An act to establish a retirement system for employees of carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and for other purposes.

STABILIZATION OF BITUMINOUS-COAL-MINING INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9100) to stabilize the bituminous-coal-mining industry and promote its interstate commerce; to provide for cooperative marketing of bituminous coal; to levy a tax on bituminous coal and provide for a drawback under certain conditions; to declare the production, distribution, and use of bituminous coal to be affected with a national public interest; to conserve the bituminous-coal resources of the United States; to provide for the general welfare, and for other purposes; and providing penalties.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 14, lines 16 and 17, to strike out "Illinois, district 10; Indiana, district 11; Iowa, district 12;

On page 14, between lines 19 and 20, to insert "Area 2: Illinois, district 10; Indiana, district 11; Iowa, district 12";

On page 14, line 20, to strike out "2" and insert "3";

On page 14, line 22, strike out "3" and insert "4";

On page 14, line 23, strike out "4" and insert "5";

On page 14, line 24, strike out "5" and insert "6";

On page 15, line 1, strike out "6" and insert "7";

On page 15, line 2, strike out "7" and insert "8";

On page 15, line 3, strike out "8" and insert "9";

On page 15, line 4, strike out "9" and insert "10."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON].

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is simply to take from minimum price area no. 1, as established by this bill, on page 14, the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Iowa, and to create a new area, no. 2, and to renumber the areas as provided in that section. This new alinement of the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Iowa would conform entirely to the set-up under the code.

I will not take the time of the Senate to discuss the amendment further, as I understand it is acceptable to the sponsors of this bill.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, on behalf of economy of time, the sponsors of the bill accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I should like the RECORD to show, as evidencing the great interest in this amendment in this Chamber, that it was discussed, so that when it shall reach the conferees they, as well as the Members of the two Houses, will not be under the impression that the Senate was not interested in and concerned about it.

I received this morning a telegram from the Iowa Coal Operators Association commenting on and commending what I said yesterday in criticism of the present constitution of the areas. The telegram reads:

DES MOINES, IOWA, August 22, 1935.

Senator LOUIS MURPHY:

Every Iowa coal operator greatly pleased about your speech on Guffey bill. Your conception of its unfairness to Iowa is well founded. Including Iowa in cheap cost eastern market area gives Iowa no protection on minimum prices to be established. Tonnage vote gives East, with overwhelming majority, chance to put Iowa out of business if competitive differentials account freight are disturbed. Guffey bill with increased labor cost, with Iowa unmechanized, will increase Iowa's cost approximately twice as much per ton as eastern fields. The tax on a percent of selling price, not including freight, makes tax approximately two times per ton for Iowa compared with East.

IOWA COAL OPERATORS ASSOCIATION.

Mr. President, I desire it to be known that if I shall vote for this bill, on its final passage, I shall be doing so on the theory that the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] accomplishes the end sought, and will be retained in the bill in conference.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I inquire what is the status of the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the pending question, and the Chair was just about to submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. I think some further statement should be made regarding the amendment. When it was read by the clerk, I took it that an effort was being made to exclude certain territory from the operations of the bill. If that be true, it is a rather unique and unusual way of legislating. I should like to have the Senator offering the amendment discuss the proposal so that we may know what it is proposed to do.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, this amendment simply intends to take from area no. 1, as presently constituted in the bill, the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Iowa, and to set them apart in another area, but not to exempt them at all from the operations of the bill. They were so grouped in their operations under the code; that arrangement was found to work very satisfactorily in that instance, and their relation in the mining of coal is so close that it was felt that they should be so grouped by this bill.

Mr. McNARY. I am very glad to state to the Senator that I can see no objection to that kind of an amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana, in view of the communication read a moment ago by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] just how his amendment affects the matter? Does the amendment place the States referred to in the amendment in a different relationship to the State of Pennsylvania from that in which they stand in the bill?

Mr. MINTON. Yes; so far as the minimum-price area is concerned.

Mr. BAILEY. So the Senator is trying to remove the very plain consequence of the bill as written of giving Pennsylvania a bituminous coal monopoly in America? I sympathize with the Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURPHY. I desire to say that the Senator from North Carolina has described the situation exactly.

Mr. BAILEY. I am very happy there was a little laughter at the point by good friends of mine who did not realize how seriously it was made. Here is the Senator from Iowa who corroborates my statement, and I made the statement not upon a guess but upon a careful reading of this bill. I am now speaking on the amendment. If this bill shall pass, it will give Pennsylvania a monopoly of the bituminous coal-mining industry in America at the expense of 125,000,000 consumers.

I intend to speak on the bill, but I am now speaking on the amendment. I rose merely to say that I sympathize with gentlemen in their efforts to protect themselves from the adverse effects of the monopolistic character of the bill.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, this amendment, beyond any question, will remove an injustice so far as Indiana, Iowa, and Illinois are concerned. This amendment will take them out of the minimum-price area in which West Virginia and Pennsylvania would otherwise be. There is no question but what without this amendment the bill, if enacted, would raise the price of coal not 2¾ cents, as was stated yesterday, but more than that many dollars. It would raise the price upon the fuel of the poor and the average citizen.

I expect to support this amendment, but, while supporting the amendment, I desire to say that the bill contains other injustices of such a character that I cannot see my way clear to support it.

I live in a little town of some 8,000 people. Around that town are located some local mines which transport their coal—which, perhaps, is not of as good quality as that the dealers sell—on trucks to the local coal dealers and to the coal bins of the citizens of my city. The close proximity of those mines enables those who use coal to obtain fuel at a very reasonable price. Yet this bill seeks to tax those producers who in no way can be considered as being engaged in interstate commerce and whose activities have in no way any effect on interstate commerce, unless interstate commerce can be employed to give someone a monopoly of their coal market and take this local activity away from my people.

I am against the bill because Illinois coal is an intrastate product, and I am not for nationalizing it. Illinois produces coal, she has her market within the borders of her own State, and but a very small percentage ever finds its way outside the State for consumption or through the channels of interstate commerce. I am not going to support any measure which will increase the price of fuel to my people, for they will receive no benefit whatever, but will only suffer from the increased price of coal. If this bill were amended, and I have thought of submitting such an amendment, so that the tax would apply only to coal consumed outside the borders of the State or that which found its way through the channels of interstate commerce, I could support the measure, but it is impossible to draw an amendment of that character without rewriting the entire bill.

However, if there is anything the Supreme Court has spoken clearly upon it is that the Congress has no right, under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution to tax an article that does not move in interstate commerce. You may try any way you may to make this bill constitutional, but it cannot be done. Congress cannot deny to the people of the sovereign States the right to use their own resources for their own purposes.

While the amendment now pending, as I have said, removes a probable design of the bill to turn the Illinois, Iowa, and Indiana market over to the mercy of the eastern coal producers, it still leaves the remainder of the eastern United States to their mercy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON]. [Putting the question.]

Mr. MURPHY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. MURPHY. I withdraw the request for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a few moments ago I asked the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] if the bill before us does not contain price-fixing provisions. I understood him to indicate that he would be glad to be advised of provisions in the bill which were calculated to fix the prices upon coal. I shall not have time under the limitations imposed upon debate to point out the many provisions of the bill which are intended to fix prices but which, if the bill shall be enacted into law, will permit price fixing. As a matter of fact the philosophy of this bill is that which was written into the N. R. A.; indeed many of its provisions are more obnoxious to personal and individual rights than those found in the N. R. A.

The N. R. A. sought to regiment individuals and to subject the business activities of the people to an oppressive Federal control. It was entirely alien to American traditions and to legitimate business concepts; it created obstacles to industrial development and retarded the movement from the depression to improved economic and industrial conditions. Its constitutionality was challenged, as the constitutionality of this bill undoubtedly will be challenged. The provisions of the N. R. A. contained provisions for the delegation of legislative authority, and, as held in the Schechter case, violated, in many points, the rights of individuals and, for that matter, of communities. I repeat, this measure goes further than the N. R. A. and imposes greater restrictions upon individuals than are found in the N. R. A.

Fortunately, one of the provisions of the original Guffey bill, which sought to create a coal monopoly and to confer upon producers and employees power which, under our form of government and under any proper economic system, is oppressive, has been eliminated; but the bill before us still has monopolistic features and provisions which invade individual rights and are at variance with the theory upon which democratic institutions are founded. That the bill is unconstitutional, it seems to me there can be no doubt. I have not time at the moment to point out the provisions which are violative of the Constitution and, as I have stated, infringe upon the rights of individuals and communities.

The struggle nowadays in this and in other countries is to preserve civil and political liberty—the rights of individuals and the rights of minorities. There is developing a cult which believes in group movements, aimed at the destruction of the States and the consolidation of all political power in the National Government. Recently an American who had visited Europe stated upon his return that the tendency of all European governments was toward centralized authority, and therefore we should follow the same path. Italy has a totalitarian state and in Germany the various states have been obliterated, and Hitler is the source of all political authority and power. The struggle for centuries was for personal and individual liberty—for civil rights.

Little by little the liberal forces weakened autocratic power and finally, in many counties, succeeded in establishing democratic forms of government. I have heard it said that Jefferson gave us the Democratic Party but that the principles upon which it was founded are being abandoned for policies and political and social philosophies repudiated in the past. Writers like Bryce and Macaulay have warned against the forces which would arise to overthrow democratic institutions and republican forms of government. That we are in a condition of ferment all will admit, and the cries of the opponents of constitutional government are heard in all parts of the land. It cannot be denied that socialistic movements have been inaugurated, and unfortunately in some parts of our country are obtaining no little support.

In my opinion the bill before us will not prove of benefit to the producers, to the mine operators, or to the mine employees, and it will seriously injure the consumers. It will prove a disappointment, and in the end, if democratic institutions are to prevail and civil and individual liberty is to be enjoyed, the philosophy upon which it is founded will be abandoned and its repeal will be assured.

I have stated that this bill rests upon the theory that minorities in groups are to be subservient to the demands of the majority; that coercion may be applied to compel obedience to the rules and regulations that are to be framed, and to a system of regimentation destructive of personal and individual rights enforced upon producers and employees.

I repeat that price fixing is one of the cornerstones in the system which the bill seeks to create. The bill contemplates that penalties shall be inflicted upon those who fail to comply with the terms of the bill, who fail to sign the code and to submit to the orders of the bureaucratic mechanism which is to be established.

An examination of the bill, in my opinion, justifies the assertion that it provides a system of boycott ruinous to producers and various groups and agencies engaged in legitimate business which do not subscribe to the codes and rules and regulations which will be formulated and enforced if this bill shall be enacted into law. The measure seeks by coercion to compel all producers to subscribe to the code and to follow the rules and regulations that the bureaucratic authority to be created shall prescribe.

I repeat that the bill is shot through with provisions to compel all producers of coal and all employees in coal mines to submit to codes and rules, regulations, and decrees aimed at eliminating all independence upon the part of producers. A powerful central organization is created by the bill, and smaller organizations are to be formed.

Marketing agencies are to be established; but all of the boards, bureaus, or agencies are subordinate to the central organization, whose authority is compelling. In each district the board shall, when directed by the commission, establish minimum prices for all kinds, qualities, and sizes of coal produced within the district. Full authority is given to make classification of coals and price variations as to mines and consuming market areas, as it may deem necessary. The commission may determine the quality, kinds, and sizes of coal, and it is to have full authority to establish minimum prices, and to make classifications of coals and price variations as to mines and consuming market areas.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] was right when he, a few moments ago, sought an amendment to the bill because he realized within its terms his State would suffer irreparable injury. It is contended by those familiar with the bill and with the coal industry that, in its present form, Pennsylvania and certain parts of West Virginia will possess advantages denied to other States. In other words, as I have been advised, these States are to be advantaged at the expense of other States.

The section from which I have read further provides that—

> Steps shall be taken so as to yield a return per net ton for each district in a minimum-price area as such districts are identified, and such area is defined in the subjoined table designated "Minimum-price area table."

The United States is divided into districts. Minimum-price areas and marketing areas are defined, and unlimited authority and power is conferred upon the bureaucratic forces created by this bill, who will directly or indirectly carry into effect the rules and regulations for the purpose of establishing maximum and minimum coal prices.

> The minimum prices so established shall reflect as nearly as possible the relative market value of the various kinds, qualities, and sizes of coal—

And so forth. On page 17 it is provided that:

> * * * Each district board shall, on its own motion, establish reasonable rules and regulations incidental to the sale and distribution of coal by code members within districts. * * *

Senators will perceive that code members are those who subscribe to the bill, and obviously those who do not will be outlaws.

On page 17 it is further provided that—

Rules and regulations are to be established to coordinate in common consuming market areas, upon a fair competitive basis the minimum prices—

And so forth. On page 19 it is stated that—

The Commission may establish maximum prices for coal in order to protect the consumer of coal against unreasonably high prices, and the Commission shall have the right to fix maximum prices for coal in any district.

It appears therefore that not only minimum but maximum prices may be fixed by the commission, and departures from those prices, as the bill provides, will be regarded as violations of the codes which are to be formed.

The bill provides that the commission is to judge what is to be a reasonable return, and the bill contains many factors which are to be considered in determining what shall be a reasonable return. The producers may not decide, but an autocratic organization is to determine by rules and regulations what the various producers shall be entitled in the operation of their mines.

On page 21 it is stated that "the minimum prices established in accordance with the provisions of this section shall not apply to coal sold by a code member and shipped outside the domestic market."

This seems to give a little relief from minimum prices where a code member finds a market outside of the United States.

On page 22 it states:

All sales and contracts for the sale of coal shall be subject to the code prices herein provided for and in effect at the time of the making of such sales and contracts. The Commission shall prescribe the price allowance to and receivable by persons who purchase coal for resale, and resell it not less than cargo or railroad lots.

The bill gives the organization, and the organizations herein provided for, authority to determine the prices, maximum and minimum, to grade coal, and to determine all the factors which are involved in the fixing of prices.

On page 40 it is declared that—

No coal may be delivered upon a contract made prior to the effective date of this act at a price below the minimum price at the time of delivery upon such contract as established pursuant to part II of section 4 of this act, and that such contract shall be invalid and unenforceable.

In other words, it seems that the bill is to be retroactive and contracts are to be declared invalid although entered into before this bill becomes a law.

There are numerous provisions in the bill—one on page 41—which, in effect, boycotts all persons who do not subscribe to the terms therein. The bill declares that no "bituminous coal shall be purchased by the United States or any department or agency thereof, produced at any mine where the producer has not complied with the provisions of the code set out in section 4 of the act." Producers which may have been operating their mines for years and have dealt fairly and equitably with their employees and with their patrons, unless they accept the provisions of this act and come under the provisions of the code, are to be boycotted.

It seems clear to me that one of the purposes of the bill is to destroy every producer who refuses to pay the so-called "tax" provided for in the bill. The destruction of the producers would undoubtedly injure their employees and communities; but the bill is to be coercively employed to force every producer into a powerful machine which the bill seeks to create. I might add that the so-called "tax" is not a tax but a penalty—a fine—and the provision pretending to impose a tax cannot be regarded otherwise than a coercive scheme to compel individuals and minorities—indeed, perhaps majorities, in many sections—to accept the terms of this measure.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. KING. I think my time has expired; but if not, I yield.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator mean that the coal operator might be willing to sell coal to the Government at a lower price, and yet could not do so under the terms of this bill?

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly.

Mr. President, I do not think I exceeded the time limit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have been hearing of the Guffey bill for a long time—I think for 6 or probably 10 weeks. I always heard, in connection with it and by way of argument for it, the statement that it would very greatly increase the wages of suffering miners in Pennsylvania. I heard a great many other things, but I heard that especially.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina will yield, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President. We have just as many Senators here as we shall have. I thank the Senator, but I intend to speak very briefly.

Yesterday when the author of the bill was presenting it to the Senate I asked him the following question:

One of the objects of the bill is to increase the wages of the coal miners. Is not that true?

The distinguished junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], on the floor at the time, answered:

No; the present wage scale will continue.

Then I asked him:

There is no intention of providing any increase?

And the Senator answered:

That would be a matter of negotiation between the mine owners and the workers.

I think we may take the word of the author of the bill, who stated here on the floor yesterday—his statement is to be found at page 13948 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—that there is no intention whatever here of increasing the wages of any miners.

I will agree that when I heard about the bill, and in a general way got the impression that there was some real intention of helping the mine workers, I could not withhold a disposition to look with some favor upon the proposal; but when I am told by the author of the bill in the Senate, and when the Senate is told that there is no intention whatever to increase their wages, I cannot imagine any other justification for supporting the measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The author of the bill is temporarily absent, trying to get a bite to eat. I do not think he meant to convey the impression that under the bill wages might not be increased. I think what he meant to say was that the primary purpose of the bill is not to increase the wages of the employees, but to stabilize the coal industry generally, which will be beneficial to operators and miners alike in probably affording them more employment, even at present wages, than they have heretofore, especially in some recent years, been able to obtain.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, of course I regret that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania is absent at this time; but that is not my fault. I had to speak at this time because the bill was about to be voted on. I wish he were present. However, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for yesterday is on the desks of Senators. The statement of my distinguished friend the Senator from Kentucky is very worthy of him; but I am going to say to him in all candor that if he will read the RECORD he will see that his statement is not at all borne out by the RECORD. I refer to the RECORD of yesterday, at page 13948, where the statement was repeated over and over again that the bill is not intended to increase the wages of the miners.

Mr. President, with that motive gone and with that inducement gone, I will leave the matter right there. There may be other reasons for supporting the proposed legislation. I heard the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr.

NEELY] urge us to vote for it in order to avert a strike. I do not intend to respond to coercion, here or anywhere else. The answer to a threat is a defiance, and that is the only answer. I do not wish to say anything that would offend people elsewhere, or here either; but I am not going to vote for any legislation, under any circumstances, to avert a strike or to avert any other manifestation of violence. That is not an argument for legislation.

Mr. GORE. If we do that once, we cannot avoid doing it repeatedly.

Mr. BAILEY. As the Senator from Oklahoma says, if we do that once we shall always be doing it. Of course we shall. When a man begins to retreat before threats, he will wind up where Tito Miléma wound up—pursued through his life, and dying by the banks of a stream at the hands of murderers. That is always the coward's fate, and the Almighty meant it so; and I think it is a good thing.

So we lose that motive also. What motive have we left for supporting the proposed legislation? No argument for wages, and certainly no argument by way of responding to coercion; and they are the principal arguments that I thought were here, one coming from the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], and the other coming from the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], and each of them being far to the fore in behalf of this legislation.

With that behind me, I am going to say that I strove with all diligence yesterday here on the floor, and in the best of faith, to ascertain from Senators advocating the proposed legislation just what this measure would cost the consumers of coal in America; and the Senate bears witness and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD testifies that I could get nothing definite. I was left to my own resources. No one would tell me, if anyone knew.

I am going to take a risk at this point. I find on my desk this morning—who placed it there, I do not know—a pamphlet purporting to be an analysis of the Guffey-Snyder bill, published under the auspices of a committee against the Guffey coal bill, H. R. Hawthorne, chairman. I know nothing about the committee, and I do not know Mr. Hawthorne. This is the first time I ever saw this pamphlet; but I am going to read into the RECORD what this pamphlet—for which certainly there is a responsibility assumed—says:

That the administration of the bill will cost 2½ cents a ton.

District code expense, 2½ cents a ton.

Interdistrict price-fixing cost, 16 cents a ton.

Intradistrict price-fixing cost, 25 cents a ton.

Coordination of prices, 44½ cents a ton.

Accounting methods, 15 cents a ton.

That makes $1.05 a ton. Then, to that, the pamphlet adds:

Total estimated wage increase if Guffey bill is passed, 45 cents a ton.

A total increase to the consumer of $1.50½ a ton.

I do not know; I should not estimate the increased cost so high. I understand that in the House committee the estimate was as low as 60 cents a ton, but no lower, and as high as $1.10 a ton. We did get the evidence here yesterday that there are 385,000,000 tons of coal mined annually in America.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Is that the increase at the mine?

Mr. BAILEY. This is the increased cost per ton, I take it, in the mine trade; yes. There are no retail taxes here.

Mr. WALSH. It does not represent what the increase might be when the costs are pyramided?

Mr. BAILEY. No; I should not say so. But let it go at 60 cents a ton, and 300,000,000 tons domestically consumed. That is $180,000,000; and if these figures are correct, the miner would get in the ratio of 45 to 150, which is practically a third. That is all he would get. The remainder would be absorbed somewhere; and it is my suspicion, though I am not prepared to say affirmatively, that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] placed his finger upon the sore spot here when he pointed out that this bill abrogates the antitrust law and places it in the power of others than the free course of trade to determine the prices paid by the millions by the firesides of America who must have coal to protect themselves from the winter.

Mr. President, that is all I wish to say, except one thing: I have here the RECORD of the Senate of June 13, 1934, in which appears, on page 11339, a very significant statement in the progress of our affairs. It reads as follows:

> When industry is government and government is industry the dual conflict deepest in our modern institutions will be abated. This is one of the basic reasons why the prospect of a planned economy is so congenial to every other hope and belief I have.

I might invoke, reverently, of course, a word from the Scriptures, and say, this day in this bill is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears.

The statement I read was the statement made by Prof. Rex G. Tugwell, the Under Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. President, this bill plainly proposes to make the coal industry government and to make this Government this industry; and the next step—the bill is already prepared—will be to take another industry—that is, the textile industry—and then the next and the next, until the program, against which protests have been made from time to time here, the program the vital power of which is stated in this sentence, "When industry is government and government is industry", its goal and the ideal, will be fulfilled and accomplished.

Mr. President, since it is admitted by the author of the bill that it will not increase the wages of the miners and no good can be accomplished in that way, and since every Senator here has reason to believe that it is without the sanction of the Constitution of our country and is contrary to the American spirit as we have known it for a century and a half, I hope that we can defeat the legislation proposed. Its defeat would be a signal relief, a source of inspiration to men and women working, standing on their own, trying to solve the depression in their own right and by their own capacity, asking only for things like this to be taken from over them; asking only that their arms may be free in order that they may deliver themselves.

I repeat, Mr. President, I hope that the proposed legislation may be defeated.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I offer a perfecting amendment to meet the objection raised by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] this morning. The purpose is to clarify the language of the bill.

In the sentence beginning in line 11 on page 4, I move to strike out, on line 13, after the word "office", the words "none of whom shall be related to any member of the Commission, within the third degree by blood or marriage"; in line 19, after the word "assistants", to insert a comma and "none of whom shall be related to any member of the Commission by marriage or within the third degree by blood"; and in line 15, after the word "shall" and the comma, to strike out the word "without" and insert "with due", so that the part which I am seeking to amend will read as follows, beginning on line 11:

> Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. The commission shall, with due regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1933, as amended, appoint and fix the compensation and duties of a secretary and necessary clerical and other assistants, none of whom shall be related to any member of the commission by marriage or within the third degree by blood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question before I propose an amendment I have in mind.

Is it a fact that the provisions of the bill exempt the employees of the commission proposed to be set up from the civil-service laws and from the Classification Act?

Mr. NEELY. The exemption is contained in the section, which reads:

> The commission shall, without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, appoint and fix the compensation and duties of a secretary and necessary clerical and other assistants.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 4, line 15, after the word "shall", to strike out the word "without" and to insert the words "with due", so as to read:

> The commission shall, with due regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, appoint and fix the compensation and duties of a secretary and necessary clerical and other assistants.

And on page 6, line 20, after the word "authorize", to strike out the word "without" and to insert the words "with due", so as to read:

> (3) Within the limitations of such appropriations as the Congress may from time to time provide, the counsel is authorized, with due regard to the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to appoint and fix the compensation and duties of such assistants and clerks, and is authorized to make such expenditures as may be necessary for the performance of the duties vested in him.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I think Senators on this side of the Chamber must realize that we have a sufficient number of issues for the coming election without being accused of abandoning the principles of the Classification Act and the civil-service laws. It has been my observation here that in all the proposals for the creation of new boards and new commissions submitted to us, invariably every one of them has exempted the employees from the Classification Act and from the civil-service laws. On at least two occasions I have, upon this floor, called attention to that situation, and have offered curative amendments which the Senate has adopted.

Recently a bill passed, and is now on its way to enactment, and will become law, if the conferees shall be able to agree, providing that the employees of the so-called "Alcohol Control Board" shall be exempt from the civil-service laws and from the Classification Act. Of all employees, these should be under civil service, for none are subjected to greater temptation or influence of favoritism.

I can understand and appreciate that in all the temporary departments of the Government, in the emergency departments, it may be impracticable to maintain civil-service standards, but when it comes to permanent boards what justification can there be for disregarding the civil-service laws?

Let us be honest about the matter. If we who are in control of the Government are against the civil-service principle, let us pass a general law exempting all employees in all departments and return to the spoils system. If we are against the Classification Act, let us pass a general law, and not pass a law which provides, as in this case is proposed, that the employees of this board shall not be subject to the civil service, and not even be obliged to receive the salaries which are fixed for comparable services in all other departments of the Government.

The Classification Act seeks to give to experts, attorneys, stenographers, secretaries, assistant secretaries, clerks, department chiefs, and like employees, uniform salaries throughout all the departments. The removal of a bureau from the Classification Act means that the bureau can pay salaries greatly in excess of those paid to employees in other departments performing the same labor.

We cannot justify that. If we really are against the civil-service laws and the Classification Act, I repeat, the honorable and manly thing to do is to repeal the civil-service laws and the Classification Act and let us have the whole thing open to spoilsmanship, and let the various bureaus fix any salaries they may see fit to fix.

There are enough abuses now in the matter of salaries in the emergency departments. Someone called my attention to a matter which I shall mention. I do not know how true it is, but it shows to what absurdity we can go. I have been told that there is one employee of this Government rated as an expert in an emergency department who is receiving $12,000 a year, and his job is to drive his superior officer to and from his office. That may be extreme, the statement may be false, and perhaps I should not even repeat it, because it seems to be so absurd; yet it is possible in a commission where the Classification Act is not in operation to pay any salary the commission chooses, without limitation and without restriction.

I remember that at some time in the past the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] called attention to the fact that as an Assistant Postmaster General he was under the Classification Act, and was obliged to receive and did accept the salary fixed by the Classification Board, which determines the salaries under that act. Yet in other departments, not under classification, higher salaries than his were paid. It would be possible, under this bill, for one not having half the duties and responsibilities of an employee under the Classification Act to receive twice the salary.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. Does the amendment reach both the consumers' counsel and the labor board?

Mr. WALSH. It does.

Mr. DIETERICH. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that on page 4 it is provided:

> The commission shall, without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, appoint and fix the compensation and duties of a secretary and necessary clerical and other assistants.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. DIETERICH. Then, on page 27 like authority is given to the labor board:

> The labor board shall, without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, appoint and fix the compensation and duties of a secretary and necessary clerical and other assistants.

That means they may fix the compensation as they please, so that under this measure those performing the same duties performed by other Government employees may receive twice the amount in salaries.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is absolutely correct, and if my amendment shall be adopted I will present a similar amendment to the language on page 27 of the bill. I hope it will not be necessary to prolong the debate on this amendment. I ask those in charge of the bill if they are not willing to accept the amendment?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I interrupt the Senator to request that the amendment which has been offered by the Senator be restated by the clerk. I happened to be out of the Chamber when the Senator proposed the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I can state it very briefly to the Senator. The pending bill exempts the employees of the commission from the Classification Act and the Civil Service Act. My amendment puts them under the civil service and under the Classification Act. It must have been an oversight not to have made the same requirements in regard to this board which have been made with respect to all permanent commissions, so I ask the Senator from West Virginia if he is not willing to accept the amendment?

Mr. NEELY. So far as I am concerned, the amendment is accepted now if that will end the debate and enable us to have a vote on the bill.

Mr. WALSH. It may be important to get a vote on the bill, but it is also important to see that Government employees are all treated alike.

Mr. NEELY. I fully appreciate that fact, but it is also very important to get a vote on the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, so the Senator may not be misled, before he agrees to that I wish to be heard briefly.

Mr. WALSH. I yield the floor to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very much in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. I wish to say a few words in order that they may be in the RECORD, and that when the bill goes to conference, if it does go there, it will appear that not only one Senator spoke in the Senate in favor of the amendment. If there is one thing which it seems to me we ought to do, but which we often do not do, it is to put the language offered by the Senator from Massachusetts in all bills by which permanent bureaus, or bureaus which are anywhere near permanent, are created. In a temporary set-up, where the work is going to be only temporary, where it is going to last only for a short time, I can see that it might be advisable to incorporate such a provision; but it ought to be in every bill which proposes to erect a permanent governmental establishment. Although a party in power may make a political machine of governmental offices, yet the chickens will always come home to roost. When a political party has nothing to keep it together except holding public office, the elements of death are already upon it. No such party can permanently live, because it is founded upon a false principle.

I understand that in England a few years ago the Government was completely captured by the Labor Party, but in all the empire that change in party brought about less than 10 changes in official life. It is clearly foreign to good government everywhere to make wholesale changes of employees when changes in government occur. The civil service has its faults. I concede that it has. Many sins are committed by civil servants. But if it were not for the fact that the Government uses civil servants to the extent it does, it would almost be impossible for the Government at times to function.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I desire to interrupt the Senator merely to say that it has been my experience and observation that exemptions from the Classification Act and the civil-service law which have been provided by some of the acts previously passed by the Congress, have not served to build up any political organization whatsoever, but have resulted merely in turning the appointive power over to the friends of those who happened to be on the commission, and appointments have been made absolutely without regard to political affiliations of any kind.

Mr. NORRIS. They ought to be made without regard to political affiliations.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I agree with the Senator, and the appointments ought to be made under the civil service.

Mr. NORRIS. And the appointees ought to be paid salaries in line with the salaries which are provided for other governmental officials and employees performing like service.

I know it is always easy, Mr. President, to cry out in the name of politics that we are only going to put good men into office, and I concede that many men who are politicians, who are Senators, governors, and members of political committees follow that rule. But it never will be efficient in the end. It always leads to inefficiency, and often to corruption, and always to extravagance. In the end, no matter what party may be in power at the time, we shall always spend more money by having officials who put their friends into office, increase their salaries, and fix salaries for them different from those which are fixed for Government employees in other lines.

I most heartily hope that when this amendment shall go to conference the conferees on the part of the Senate will realize that the Senate is behind them, and that they should insist on this amendment going into the bill. When this amendment shall have been adopted I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to prepare another amendment for another place in the bill, which I think is on page 27, and let that amendment be offered also.

Mr. WALSH. As soon as the pending amendment shall have been agreed to I shall offer another amendment.

Mr. NORRIS subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, in connection with my remarks made on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] relative to the civil service, there may be printed in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Lincoln Star, one of the leading Democratic newspapers of the United States.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Lincoln (Nebr.) Star, Aug. 17, 1935]

DEMOCRATIC HARI KARI

There appeared in this column of the Star Friday excerpts from a letter written by a prominent Democratic leader in Nebraska, giving one of the subordinate officials in the new works administration the devil because his brother-in-law had not been taken care of through appointment to a position. He is a man who has had a great deal to say in a critical sense about the F. E. R. A. program in the State, insisting it was manned by Republicans. He had more to say about the indignation of the rank and file of the Democratic Party, but the substance of his song was that he wanted to know whether the brother-in-law was going to get a job.

While the results of a congressional defeat for the Roosevelt administration in a special election in Rhode Island are being given interpretation in a thousand different ways, it might be well to read what a distinguished Washington correspondent of an equally great American newspaper has to say was the cause of an overturn of a smashing Democratic majority 2 years ago into an impressive Republican victory. The ever-painstaking, accurate, and uncanny T. C. Alford, of the staff of the Kansas City Star, assigns two reasons for the Rhode Island explosion:

First. A Republican appeal to a class of voters entirely industrial in their occupations inciting their wrath against the A. A. A. program, particularly the processing taxes imposed to pay benefits to farmers participating in the program of acreage reduction.

Second. Patronage troubles. On this point Mr. Alford wrote:

"It has also been charged that the Democratic leaders in Rhode Island, and as well in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York, have taken big patronage plums for themselves and have actually turned hundreds of old officeholders out of their jobs. In Rhode Island employees who had served for 20 years ruthlessly were tossed out of office by the Democratic machine."

Mr. Alford might just as well have written that about Nebraska as the States mentioned, with one exception. In Nebraska it has not been so much the case of grabbing off patronage plums for the leaders themselves as it has been attempting or plugging offices with kin and with political henchmen. The letter referred to in the opening paragraph of this article furnishes a shining example. Its author not only insisted that a brother-in-law should be provided with a governmental job but he desired a position sometime ago for another relative.

In Nebraska the situation has been even more complicated. It is no dark secret that in 1934 an intense factional fight developed. It was time for a truce when the election determined the outcome. Even had it continued only as a scrap between the leaders on both sides, it would not have been so destructive, but it has been permitted to percolate down to the roots; to the humblest of individuals seeking appointment. Too frequently their fitness and their qualification for appointment have been determined solely by whether they belonged to this faction or that faction. That has been bad and if it is permitted to continue until 1936 it will have a decisive bearing upon the outcome.

Finally, there has been a determined effort on the part of some Nebraska Congressmen at Washington to utilize every governmental agency on which they could put their fingers for the purpose of building up a personal political machine. Of course, they were doing it for Mr. Roosevelt. Their votes on certain must legislation embraced in the President's program indicated how deeply they were concerned with his welfare and how much they sympathized with it. But they wanted their own bellwethers in the positions of importance—they, and they only, were qualified to carry out the administration's program. Just how much reliance could be placed upon them when the Congressmen insistent upon their appointments were voting in opposition to the President, and with an alert and militant Republican minority upon legislative measures which the White House said was urgent?

The Japs had a word for it—this business of falling upon one's sword. And that is what Democratic leaders in many States and Democratic Congressmen have been doing.

The administration of relief under Harry Hopkins was one of Mr. Roosevelt's undertakings. No one in Nebraska has complained that the job was not honestly handled. Few who will reflect and will weigh the magnitude of the undertaking would come to any other conclusion but that it was administered superbly. But it did not please the politicians. They wanted their henchmen in office. They wanted the jobs for their friends. They wanted to build up a machine which would bow to their will and do their bidding.

And they were willing even to go out and attack an administration program simply because they could not dictate who should have this job or that one.

Nebraska normally is more Republican than Democratic, and more liberal or progressive than either Republican or Democratic. It has been that independent, free-thinking vote which has settled elections in the State. But no Democrat, if he will be honest with himself, will fail to overlook that in addition to thousands of Progressives, scores of Republicans in every sizable community have been supporting the President and his administration. If the Democratic machine in Nebraska is to make the fatal mistake of forgetting those fundamental facts, it may prepare to pack its bag after November of 1936. The President deserves a kindlier fate than is being prepared for him by politicians who refuse to look beyond the ends of their noses. He has made a grand effort on behalf of the American people to assist them along the path of recovery.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have in connection with such bills as the pending bill agreed to amendment after amendment to put the employees in the Civil Service; but when the bill comes back to the Senate, the amendment is out. As a result public service becomes a racket, a political racket, like a party racket, which is the biggest racket in the country today.

I wish to say a word in support of what the Senator from Nebraska said. The spoils system is polluting our civil government from top to bottom. In England when a party changes power 130 men go out and 130 men come in. The civil service continues there. That is why England has survived through all the tribulations and the struggles of her existence as a nation. I do not believe that the Congress or the present administration can afford to continue this racketeering in Government jobs.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I must again say to the Senator from Nebraska, in view of what has been said by the Senator from Minnesota, that if there has been any racketeering in Government jobs it has not been on the part of any members of the present administration or of any political party. The appointments which have been made under exemptions of this kind have not been made by political party dictation or recommendation, but have been made, in the great majority of cases, by private favoritism of those who happened to be appointed. One of the chief causes for the wreck of the N. R. A. was that this exemption was used for the purpose of placing in positions of importance, in the so-called "key positions", men who were altogether out of harmony with the purposes of the administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I move now, in order to carry out the same intent, on page 27, at the end of line 16 and the beginning of line 17, to strike out the word "without" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "with due", so the sentence will read:

The Labor Board shall, with due regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923—

And so forth.

Mr. NEELY. That amendment is acceptable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I send forward an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 15, line 8, to insert after the word "district" the words "and also between producers in competing districts."

Mr. NEELY. That amendment is also acceptable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF ENSIGNS IN THE NAVY

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2521) amending section 5 of Public Law No. 264, Seventy-third Congress, approved May 29, 1934, relative to the appointment of Naval Academy graduates as ensigns in the Navy, which were, on page 2, line 4, to strike out "August" and insert "November"; on the same page, line 6, to strike out "appointed in 1933" and insert "of the Navy"; on the same page, line 23, to strike out "August" and insert "November"; and on the same page, line 24, to strike out "then in the service" and insert "of the Navy."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

STABILIZATION OF BITUMINOUS COAL MINING INDUSTRY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9100) to stabilize the bituminous coal mining industry and promote its interstate commerce; to provide for cooperative marketing of bituminous coal; to levy a tax on bituminous coal and provide for a drawback under certain conditions; to declare the production, distribution, and use of bituminous coal to be affected with a national public interest; to conserve the bituminous-coal resources of the United States; to provide for the general welfare, and for other purposes; and providing penalties.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from West Virginia if he does not intend to offer an amendment dealing with the consumers counsel. The bill provides that he may appoint as many assistants and clerks as he pleases and may fix their compensation and duty. This is too much power to confer upon him.

While the Senator is looking for the provision, I shall offer an amendment. On page 41, commencing with line 12 and running through lines 13 and 14, I move that the words in those lines be stricken out, the words being—

Unless such marketing agency shall have been approved by the commission provided in section 4 of this act.

As I interpret the provision of section 13, Mr. President, it permits combinations to be formed, which would be in restraint of trade, if the marketing agency shall have been approved by the commission. Reading section 13 will make, perhaps, more clear what I have in mind. Section 13 provides:

Any combination between producers creating a marketing agency for the disposal of competitive coals in interstate commerce at prices to be determined by such agency or by the agreement of the producers operating through such agency, shall be unlawful as a restraint of interstate trade and commerce within the provisions of the act of Congress of July 2, 1890, known as the "Sherman Act", and acts amendatory and supplemental thereto—

With that provision I am in entire accord; but there follows—

unless such marketing agency shall have been approved by the commission as provided in section 4 of this act.

So that nullifies or modifies the provision which prevents combinations which are in restraint of trade. It seems to me there ought not to be combinations, marketing or otherwise, that might be in restraint of trade, even though they secure the benediction of the commission.

The first part of section 13 declares what ought to be the law and what is the law, namely, that combinations in competing articles or in restraint of trade or which are monopolistic in character or which tend to monopoly are unlawful under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust laws and the Clayton Act.

The first eight lines of section 13 provide that combinations of the character therein indicated, by means of marketing agreements, are in violation of the law, but, notwithstanding, they violate the law, if those who thus combine can receive absolution at the hands of the commission to be created, the violations will be condoned; that is to say, in that event the producers are to be absolved from the terms of the Antitrust Act.

I think it would be very unwise to permit any provision to remain in this bill, in view of the unlimited authority which is to be conferred upon the commission and upon subordinate officials, which would directly, in any specific way, legalize acts in contravention of the terms of the antitrust law.

We know that there have been, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said today, many combinations in restraint of trade. The antitrust laws have been flouted; they have not been enforced as they should have been. I shall not say where the fault lies, and whom we should blame, but it is conceded that trusts and monopolies have thrived in the United States to the disadvantage of the country. Here, however, in the case of an essential of life we are authorizing combinations, marketing agreements, which will tend to create and undoubtedly will create monopolies if the Commission say that that may be done. I submit, Mr. President, that the amendment which I have offered should be adopted. I hope that the Senator from West Virginia will accept the amendment.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, it is impossible for the Senator from West Virginia to accept the amendment, because, if it were adopted, the entire purpose of the bill would be defeated. One of the outstanding objects of this legislation is to end the ruthless, bankrupting competition which has for many years raged among coal operators throughout the country.

The wages of miners represent 65 percent of the cost of producing coal. All other mining costs are practically irreducible. Therefore, the warring operators habitually seek to recoup the losses of their disastrous competition by reducing the wages of their employees.

If the pending amendment prevails, the competitive warfare among coal operators and the slashing of miners' wages, which now average less than $57 a month, will, beyond the peradventure of a doubt, indefinitely continue. In the circumstances the friends of the bill should vote against the amendment.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NEELY. Gladly.

Mr. DIETERICH. When the Senator talks about cutthroat competition he refers to those who are in the same marketing area who are trying to undersell each other. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. NEELY. I mean a majority of all the coal operators in the United States.

Mr. DIETERICH. I mean they compete with each other in the same market area?

Mr. NEELY. In every marketing area and in every conceivable way.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I am now directing my thought to the bill. It refers to marketing areas, and, of course, the cutthroat competition this bill seeks to eliminate is on the part of those who are in the same marketing area and are underselling in the same market? That must necessarily follow, must it not?

Mr. NEELY. That does not follow. The bill, if enacted, will prevent cutthroat competition in the coal industry in every section of the United States.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I should like now to address myself to the amendment. I find that the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON]—and I am sorry he is not present at the moment—does not cure or correct, as I thought it would, the evil condition at which it was aimed. I find on reading the bill, on page 17, provision (b), as follows:

(b) District boards shall, under rules and regulations established by the commission, coordinate in common consuming market areas upon a fair competitive basis the minimum prices and the rules and regulations established by them, respectively, under subsection (a) hereof.

I am talking now about a central market such as the city of Chicago. The reports show that of the coal consumed in that particular market, over 50 percent of it has found its way there from the fields of western Pennsylvania and West Virginia. So Chicago, even with the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, would still be in this common marketing area, and so the amendment would not prevent harm being done to the producers in Illinois, Indiana, and Iowa, because they still must get together and agree on a price which will admit the coal of West Virginia and Pennsylvania into the market of Chicago as a fair competitor with the coal of Illinois, Indiana, and Iowa. That means that the coal produced near that market will not have the advantage of the freight differential but must raise the price to the consumers in the particular area in order to meet the competition of the fields of Pennsylvania and West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my 10 minutes were interfered with, but I will now take my time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquires of the Senator if he has not spoken on the bill?

Mr. KING. No; not on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the clerk who keeps the time that the Senator has already spoken on the bill.

Mr. KING. I have not; I have spoken on the amendment, but not on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair points out to the Senator that when he first spoke there was no amendment pending. Therefore, from a parliamentary standpoint, he was speaking on the bill. However, unless there is objection, the Senator from Utah will be heard on the amendment. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator is recognized on his amendment. He has, however, spoken on the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will occupy but a few moments. This measure, like others which have received the approval of this Congress, is not only condemned as being unconstitutional, but also as constituting a further effort to socialize industries of our country. It is not inaccurate to say that this measure is being driven through Congress because of the threats of an organization that a Nation-wide strike in the bituminous industry will result if it were not enacted into law.

Unfortunately there are instances where legislative bodies have yielded to threats of violence and to extraneous forces, but it must be admitted that legislation enacted because of threats or coercion is not calculated to produce results in the interest of the welfare of the people. In a republic such as this, where the legislative branch of the Government is presumed to be independent and is charged with the responsibility of enacting under the Constitution those measures—and only those measures—for which warrant is found in the Constitution, and which are for the public weal, it is most unfortunate that the suggestion should be made that laws should be enacted because of demands of groups or organizations.

It has been suggested that regardless of its constitutionality it should speedily receive the approval of Congress. I repeat that any measure that is driven through Congress in response to threats or coercion cannot be otherwise than an indirect, if not a direct, assault upon our form of government. That this measure by laymen and lawyers is regarded as without the power of Congress to enact I think will be admitted. But if it were not unconstitutional it should not, in my opinion, receive the approval of Congress because of its challenge to our economic and industrial life and to the political principles upon which this Republic rests. This is a republic—not a socialistic government.

Undoubtedly there are some in positions of responsibility who are dissatisfied with our form of government and desire to convert it into a socialistic government. There are others who would devitalize the States and give to the Federal Government authority and power such as may be found in highly centralized, if not autocratic, governments. There are some Americans who do not believe in local self-government, in strong and puissant sovereign States, but who are determined to wrest from individuals and from States rights and privileges and liberties which they enjoy and to subject them to a powerful Federal Government which is to be untrammelled by the Constitution of the United States and the limitations therein found.

Undoubtedly, as I have indicated, there are those who would have the Federal Government take over the control of industry and enforce a system of regimentation upon individuals and every form of business paralleled in socialistic, if not sovietized states.

If this bill shall be enacted into law demands will be made for the enactment of other measures for the socialization of the industries of our country. Already, I am told, that efforts will be made to secure the passage of a bill at the next session of Congress which will subject the textile industry, as well as others, to Federal control, and to the socialistic or paternalistic regimentation similar to that to which the bituminous-coal industry is to be subjected.

Within the past few days the leader of a great mining organization, who has been an important factor in the formulation of this measure and whose influence has been pervasive in securing its passage through the House, stated in an address delivered at Charlottesville, Va.:

> All the other natural resources industries—anthracite coal, oil, gas, lumber, copper, and electric power—must soon follow this precedent.

He was referring to the Guffey bill, the measure before us. In other words, his position is that if the Guffey bill shall be passed at this session of Congress, measures of like import will be demanded dealing with other industries. The person referred to continues:

> If experience under a public-utility status should be ineffective, or should the Supreme Court declare the Guffey coal bill unconstitutional, recourse must at once be had to a constitutional amendment or to Government ownership and operation.

This statement is pregnant with meaning and is indicative of the purpose of some to overturn our economic and political system and to adopt national socialism or some other form of economic and political life entirely alien to democratic institutions and to our republican form of government.

I regret that when the bill was under consideration by the House of Representatives the statement was made by one in high authority that the fear of its constitutionality ought not to deter action upon the measure.

Mr. President, permit me to quote from a statement made by a great jurist, Judge Thomas M. Cooley:

> Legislators have their authority measured by the Constitution; they are chosen to do what it permits and nothing more, and they take solemn oath to obey and support it. When they disregard its provisions, they usurp authority, abuse their trust, and violate the promise they have confirmed by an oath. To pass an act when they are in doubt whether it does not violate the Constitution, is to treat as of no force the most imperative obligations any person can assume. A business agent who would deal in that manner with his principal's business would be treated as untrustworthy; a witness in court who would treat his oath thus lightly, and affirm things concerning which he was in doubt, would be held a criminal. Indeed, it is because the legislature has applied the judgment of its members to the question of its authority to pass the proposed law, and has only passed it after being satisfied of the authority, that the judiciary waive their own doubts, and give it their support.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement concerning the amendment. Section 4 provides for the creation of marketing agents set up by coal producers with the approval of the commission provided for in the act.

Section 13 provides against any combination of any of the producers which shall have created a marketing agency under the act with reference to prices, unless such marketing agency shall have been approved by the commission.

This morning the Senate eliminated from the bill that portion which suspended the antitrust laws with respect to any of the agreements entered into by producers operating under this bill who are members of the code. That amendment was accepted by the sponsors of the bill probably on the theory that it did set up two classes of coal producers, those in the codes and those outside the codes. At least they accepted the amendment for the purpose of taking it to conference and trying to work it out there.

If the antitrust laws are to be in full force with respect to those who enter codes and those who do not enter codes, the whole of section 13 would be unnecessary, because the antitrust laws would be operative anyway without this provision in the bill.

Inasmuch as that part of the bill suspending the antitrust laws has been eliminated, and inasmuch as, for coal producers who form a selling agency or marketing agency to represent their coal, whether they are competitive or not, it may be necessary for all such producers creating a marketing agency in any area or in any city to have some understanding with respect to the price at which that coal is to be sold to the public, therefore, I think it would be a mistake to strike out section 13.

If section 13 is to remain in the bill, I think it would be a mistake to strike out the language covered in the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. The whole matter must go to conference on the question of the antitrust laws, and I believe it could be worked out better with this language in the bill than with it stricken out. Therefore I hope the amendment of the Senator from Utah will be defeated.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks just made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] I desire to invite attention to the fact that the words eliminated from section 4 yesterday on motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] undertook to exempt from the operation of the antitrust laws three classes of persons or, more properly, agencies or corporations—the producers of bituminous coal who agree to the code, marketing agencies set up under the bill, and boards created under the bill.

Section 13 exempts only marketing agencies. Therefore with the first sentence of section 4 out of the bill——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. It does not exempt merely the marketing agency. It exempts the producers creating marketing agencies because it relates to any combination between producers to create a marketing agency for the disposal of the coal.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; but it is the combination of producers for the creation of a marketing agency that is exempted. That is the only act to be relieved of the prohibitions of the antitrust laws under the bill as it now stands. Any agreement upon the part of the producers of bituminous coal for any other purpose authorized by this bill is not exempted from the operation of the antitrust laws by the present language. Any action by any board set up under the bill is not exempted. Therefore I quite agree with what the Senator has said, that if it is intended to make the bill operative there must be a substitute for the first sentence of section 4.

Yesterday I offered such a substitute, but because those who are in charge of the bill felt that it was desirable to accept the amendment of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I did not press it. However, I think that for the purpose of the conference attention should be called to that amendment, which appears on page 13938 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 21.

It might also be pointed out that the first sentence of section 4 as it came from the House undertook to exempt from the antitrust laws any producer of bituminous coal who agreed to the code. The effect of that language would have been to permit producers of coal who had complied with the bill to enter into combination with respect to any other commodity in which they might be interested. For example, under the House language, which reads as follows:

SEC. 4. While this act is in effect and for 60 days thereafter, the provisions of the antitrust laws of the United States shall not apply to any producer of bituminous coal who has accepted and obligated himself to comply, and who complies with the provisions of this section, or to any marketing agency or board created under and operating in compliance with this section.

A steel corporation, owning a coal mine, could enter into a conspiracy in restraint of trade in steel, by adhering to the provisions of this measure with respect to the production of coal. That, of course, was not intended.

The amendment which I offered yesterday would cure that defect by providing that compliance with the terms of the bill shall not be construed to be within the prohibitions of the antitrust laws. Instead of exempting persons or corporations from the antitrust laws generally, this amendment merely provides that acts authorized by this bill shall not be regarded as prohibited by the antitrust laws.

In other words, the substitute says in effect that compliance with the new coal code shall not be held to be a conspiracy in restraint of trade. The amendment would amend the antitrust laws so far as this code is concerned and that, of course, is wholly within the constitutional power of Congress. So I feel if we really want to accomplish the objectives of this bill we should provide a substitute for the first sentence in section 4. Without such a substitute, I fear the measure will be wholly ineffective.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have received a telegram from the Utah Coal Operators Association stating that they are opposed to the passage of the Guffey bill.

Mr. President, I have a number of excerpts from newspapers in various parts of the United States briefly referring to the Guffey bill. I ask permission to have them inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be inserted in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WHAT THE NATION'S PRESS THINKS OF H. R. 8479, THE GUFFEY-SNYDER BILL

"The plain truth is that in defiance of the Supreme Court's clear distinction between direct and indirect effects (on interstate commerce), this (Guffey) bill's main purpose is to usurp regulatory power over the mining of coal now possessed solely by the several States in which coal is mined." (The New York Sun.)

"A protest of the 'people's lobby' against passage of the Guffey bill to establish the bituminous-coal industry as a public utility because the increased costs will bear heaviest on coal consumers illustrates one of the bill's many defects." (Morgantown, W. Va., Dominion-News.)

"The Guffey bill * * * creates a monopoly in coal, and it will of necessity increase the cost of production and increase the cost of coal to the consumer." (Beckley (W. Va.) Post-Herald.)

"The National Consumers League has turned its guns on the (Guffey) bill for the reason that it will increase the price of all coal." (Terre Haute (Ind.) Tribune.)

"The soft-coal industry may be beset by problems of overproduction and cutthroat competition, not to mention other handicaps, but relief will not be provided by turning it over to the control of a Federal bureaucracy." (Huntington (W. Va.) Advertiser.)

"A thoroughly bad measure in every respect." (Cincinnati (Ohio) Enquirer.)

"The National Association of Manufacturers * * * asked Congress and the Federal Government to * * * lay aside * * * the Guffey coal bill. * * * Congress and Federal officials can afford to heed this appeal." (Ardsley (N. Y.) Sun.)

"Whatever its motives may be, the (Guffey-Snyder) measure bids fair to spell disaster for the soft-coal industry, not only as regards the operators but the miners and everybody dependent on it." (Harrisburg (Pa.) Patriot.)

"The Guffey bill goes far beyond the normal scope of Government regulation and * * * establishes in the coal industry—one not hitherto regarded as a public utility—a vast Government-controlled monopoly." (Coal Dealer, Minneapolis, Minn.)

"Whether the Government or private owners conduct the (coal) industry, under the Guffey bill there is a dark future for it. * * * the regulation and price-fixing features of the Guffey bill will be the knockout blow * * *." (Somerset (Pa.) Herald.)

"Congress and the Federal Government are worrying industry and business. There is, it seems, talk about 'disturbing legislation' which includes * * * the Guffey coal bill * * *." (Kissimmee Valley (Fla.) Gazette.)

"Those from Kentucky who ask enactment of the Guffey bill to nationalize the coal industry represent neither owners of coal properties nor consumers. This is purely a politicians' bill for the benefit of a northern union and a handful of northern mine operators." (Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal.)

"It is only natural that the coal operators of southern West Virginia should look with an extremely fishy eye upon the Guffey coal bill * * *." (Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette.)

"There is now pending before the United States Senate a bill known as the 'Guffey bill' * * *. This bill, as we see it, will * * * increase the cost of coal to the consumer, according to some estimates, as much as 25 percent, which will decrease the coal output. Reducing the coal output will put thousands of men out of work." (Scott County (Tenn.) News.)

"* * * the soft coal miners don't know whether they were knocked out by the Roosevelt administration or by (Senator) GUFFEY himself * * *. They know they have been fooled, and that's enough. They are blaming either GUFFEY or the President, or both." (Beaver (Pa.) Times.)

"The (Guffey-Snyder) bill is rendered almost ridiculous because its monopolistic control can be achieved only over one class of fuel. Hard coal, oil, gas, and electricity are competing sources of power and fuel, to which consumers will turn as the price of bituminous coal rises. Then its production will decrease, with consequent hardship to employees and operators." (Grand Rapids (Mich.) Press.)

"The Guffey coal bill starts out in a clear sky with a tail wind, but is soon bogged down and hunting for a place to land. The Supreme Court decisions have put a crimp in some of the new-deal legislative efforts. Reform measures are no longer looked upon with the feeling that once characterized them. Recovery programs are receiving consideration. Labor may still be in the driver's seat, but it does not crack the whip nearly as loud as it did in other days. A sigh of relief will be heard all over this fair but troubled land when Congress adjourns." (Coal Mining, Pittsburgh, Pa.)

"* * * with the Government definitely pledged to a program of development of water power, it would seem that the coal operators (supporting the Guffey bill) are letting themselves in for something when they endorse a plan to retire 'marginal' coal properties at the discretion of a Government bureau." (Terre Haute, Ind., Star.)

"The Southern group (of coal operators) sees little advantage in the proposed Guffey bill; the northern group believes the bill would further solidify advantages (of) Pennsylvania and northern operators * * *." (Greensburg (Pa.) Tribune.)

"The argument against Government in business is the general argument against the Guffey coal bill. It would hand the coal business over to Mr. Ickes' Department of the Interior." (The Charleston (W. Va.) Daily Mail.)

"The features of the Guffey-Snyder bill which have won the chief acclaim of its proponents are dangerous from an industrial, economic, and social point of view." (Indianapolis (Ind.) Star.)

"From the standpoint of the consumer, enactment of the Guffey-Snyder bill would be certain to result in higher coal prices." (Combustion, New York City.)

"The southwestern field coal operators, fighting against the competition of oil and gas, are opposing the Guffey coal monopoly bill, which provides for price control and allocation of tonnages by a group taking its place among the countless other bureaus in Washington." (Pittsburg (Kans.) Headlight.)

"The greatest danger to the coal industry * * * now that its code has been destroyed by the Supreme Court, is not necessarily a return to the old regime of suicidal competition with profitless operation and starvation wages. The greatest danger may very well be the hasty enactment of ill-considered and unfair legislation along the lines of the * * * Guffey bill." (The Morgantown (W. Va.) Post.)

"The Guffey bill, with the habiliments of a Christmas tree, looks like a good thing to a lot of folks who never investigate below the trimmings, but, like apples of Sodom, it is ashes within." (Dubois (Pa.) Courier.)

"The public's interest in an adjustment of coal control (such as proposed in the Guffey-Snyder bill) should not be ignored in legislation which Congress may approve." (Muncie (Ind.) Star.)

"The (Guffey) bill would give the United Mine Workers of America a practical labor monopoly with the power to demand higher wages and get them. The Government would undertake to maintain prices high enough to absorb added wage costs, and thus the consumer would again shoulder the burden." (Ashland (Ky.) Independent.)

"* * * Prosperity can be restored only by removing the main barrier—politics. With this done efficiency and thrift should be encouraged, business profits permitted, private initiative given free scope within limits of fair dealing, and a junking of the legislation now before Congress, including * * * Guffey coal bill * * *." (Hoboken (N. J.) Observer.)

"* * * the constitutionality of the Guffey bill is distinctly open to question, in the light of the Schechter case precedent, in view of its detailed regulation of certain purely intrastate mining activities." (New Jork Journal of Commerce.)

"The (bituminous coal) industry has a way out that is less precarious than the questionable Guffey bill." (Chicago Journal of Commerce.)

"If the administration is able to read the handwriting on the wall, if it is able to comprehend the significance of this (the Supreme Court decision in the Schechter case) judicial restatement of constitutional principles, then it will * * * abandon several pending measures, such as * * * the Guffey bill, which are certainly unwise and probably unconstitutional in their grants of authority." (Sturgis (Mich.) Journal.)

"* * * this (the Supreme Court decision in the Schechter case) explains the concern with which operators and labor leaders at Washington * * * are examining the bill Senator GUFFEY designed to place the coal industry on a public-utility status." (Brownsville (Pa.) Telegraph.)

"The Guffey bill * * * would make coal a public utility * * *." (Jamestown (N. Y.) Post.)

"Those Congressmen who are in a mood to examine rather critically the whole subject of governmental economic 'regimentation' at this time may well give a few thoughts to the potentialities for error, even danger, in the Federal coal-control bill sponsored by Pennsylvania's Senator GUFFEY." (Kalamazoo (Mich.) Gazette.)

"The evil consequences of * * * such vicious measures as * * * the Guffey coal bill * * * are strongly opposed by conservative opinion." (Lexington (Ky.) Leader.)

"One difficulty which must be surmounted, if the Guffey-Snyder bill is to be made to meet constitutional rules, is presented by certain declarations of the Supreme Court, which point out an opinion that the coal mines may not be a part of interstate commerce in their relations with their employees." (Danbury (Conn.) News-Times.)

"How any legislation of this nature (the Guffey-Snyder bill) can be set up by Congress in view of the Supreme Court decision (in the Schechter case) remains to be explained." (Brooklyn (N. Y.) Eagle.)

"The United Mine Workers are strongly pressing for passage of the Guffey bill. * * * Likewise a majority of Northern operators * * * favor the Guffey bill." (Pittsburgh (Pa.) Press.)

"The Guffey bill is not a perfect instrument * * *." (Birmingham (Ala.) Post.)

"Some contend that the Guffey bill calls for socialization of the industry. The plan is much closer to fascism, however, since it aims at a soft-coal cartel in America." (Rockford (Ill.) Star.)

"The true call of the hour (as opposed to the proposals of the Guffey bill) is for * * * only such legislation as is clearly designed to promote recovery, and that only upon lines which do not risk invalidation by the courts on the ground of unconstitutionality." (Hartford (Conn.) Times.)

"* * * the United Mine Workers prepare strike orders for 450,000 soft-coal workers, but hope Congress will 'avert' a strike by passing the Guffey bill * * *." (New Orleans (La.) Tribune.)

"The Guffey bill * * * would set standard wages and hours (ignoring present economically necessary differentials), fix minimum and maximum prices." (Toledo (Ohio) News Bee.)

"* * * the Guffey coal bill is probably unconstitutional * * *." (Princeton (W. Va.) Observer.)

"* * * (Guffey) bill needs reexamination in the light of the Supreme Court's decision on N. R. A." (Erie (Pa.) Times.)

"The Guffey bill has been amended in some particulars, but it still contains provisions deemed unsatisfactory to * * * consumers." (Auburn (Ind.) Star.)

"Higher (coal) prices will restrict manufacturing and increase unemployment. * * * The Guffey measure would not work * * *. It is too much like the A. A. A. theory of crop reduction." (Lockport (N. Y.) Union Sun and Journal.)

"Although the Guffey bill, providing for nationalization of the soft-coal regions, is at the head of President Roosevelt's 'must' legislative program there is insistent belief * * * the measure is unconstitutional. * * * The status of the Guffey bill, therefore, is in considerable doubt, but whatever may be its fate, there is no sound reason * * * that the anthracite industry should also be under Federal control and regulation." (Scranton (Pa.) Republican.)

"Consumer representatives have objected to the (Guffey-Snyder) bill * * *." (N. E. A. Syndicate.)

"The Guffey bill, which temporarily may end the hazard of a coal strike in the bituminous field, by making the coal industry a public utility, has the same weakness the N. R. A. had." (South Bend (Ind.) News-Times.)

"Though it is claimed * * * the Guffey coal bill * * * (has) * * * been modified to escape the condemnation of the Supreme Court, competent lawyers, some of them in Congress, believe * * * (it has) * * * provisions of dubious constitutionality. In fact, some of the provisions insisted upon are regarded as plainly unconstitutional." (Springfield (Mass.) Union.)

"Congress should take its time with the Guffey bill. Its constitutionality is in doubt, and there are various phases of it that will need the most serious attention." (Kansas City (Mo.) Times.)

"It is more or less an open secret that Justice Department lawyers generally consider the Guffey-Snyder coal bill unconstitutional. * * * Its price-fixing features are definitely monopolistic; its tax provision is coercive and not for the purpose of raising revenue; and, anyway, the Supreme Court already has held that coal mining is not interstate commerce." ("News Behind the News" syndicate.)

"The (Guffey) bill * * * not only concerns (coal) operators and miners, but it reaches the consumers and integrated industrial groups. * * * The lawmakers in Washington should go slow in considering the (Guffey) measure." (Danville (Ill.) Commercial News.)

"* * * the fact remains that the executive branch of the Government ought not to sponsor and seek enactment of a measure (such as the Guffey-Snyder bill) of doubtful constitutionality." (Albany (N. Y.) Knickerbocker-Press.)

"We cannot help but believe that the * * * opponents of this (Guffey-Snyder) bill * * * are correct in their declarations that no matter how much the teeth in this bill are dulled that it will still be unconstitutional * * *." (Grafton (W. Va.) Sentinel.)

"* * * the Guffey bill is unconstitutional. Doubtless it will be tested in the courts. (Chattanooga (Tenn.) Times.)

"If the rank and file of consumers were familiar with the provisions and certain effects of the so-called 'bituminous coal "conservation" bill', being sponsored jointly by Senator GUFFEY, of Pennsylvania, and Representative SNYDER, of the same State, this unwise measure would not now be on its way to (a vote) in Congress." (St. Louis (Mo.) Post-Dispatch.)

"Probably everyone in Washington realizes passage of the Guffey-Snyder bill, with its unconstitutional provisions, would be an act in defiance of the Supreme Court, and that the measure would be thrown out on final appeal." (Southbridge (Mass.) News.)

"Congress is met * * * with the alternative of passing the Guffey coal bill or facing a strike in the bituminous-coal industry. A long-range piece of legislation rests not on the basis of its merits but is placed under the duress of a threatened calamity." (Manchester (N. H.) Union.)

"If the President's hopes for a permanent solution (of the bituminous-coal problem) rest on the Guffey bill, * * * it rests on a very insecure foundation. The bill is just as unconstitutional as the original N. R. A." (Eureka (Calif.) Times.)

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have decided that my duty to my constituents dictates that I should vote against this bill.

To begin with, in view of the Schechter and other Supreme Court decisions, I have grave doubt concerning the constitutionality of the measure which, in view of the many other economic disadvantages I perceive in it, I cannot resolve in favor of the bill. In addition, I regard this as distinctly class and discriminatory legislation. I am unable to accept the view that subsidies should be given to the coal or any other industry out of the pockets of the consumers.

The following specific objections which have been raised against the bill I deem to be tenable:

First. That its intent and result will be inevitably to raise prices of bituminous coal substantially to consumers, especially in States having no coal supply.

Second. Its price-fixing features are unworkable and impractical, as has been demonstrated by past experience whenever attempts have been made to freeze prices at certain levels. The recent experience of N. R. A., where voluntary agreements governed, rather than the legislative rules provided in this bill, give ample proof of the fact that price-fixing and artificial manipulation of prices are alien to American industrial ideals.

Third. Artificial restrictions upon coal production, with consequent rise in prices, will reduce the demand for coal, thereby increasing the markets for substitutes, and aggravating the very conditions which the bill seeks to relieve.

Fourth. The bill presumes to deal with the interests of the producers and the workers, but contains no provision whatever to safeguard the public interest as evidenced by the failure to consider the effect of added burdens to consumers.

Fifth. It calls for unwarranted and compulsory regimentation of an important American industry, leaving independent producers reluctant to join the codes at the mercy of the whims of administrators and bureaucrats.

Sixth. It constitutes an invasion of the reserved powers of the States, and an encroachment by the Federal Government upon intrastate activities, and interference with the rights and interests of local subdivisions of government.

Seventh. The effort which the bill makes to use the taxing power to coerce independent business men to join the code against their will is obnoxious. While the use of the taxing power to prevent or discourage the continuance of practices detrimentally affecting health, safety, morals, and the general welfare of our people under the provisions of the powers reserved to the several States may sometimes be advisable and salutary, I am opposed to using the taxing power without having in mind, as a main consideration, the problem of raising revenue. In brief, I am opposed to all forms of taxation which have as their sole object the effectuation of social change by the various confiscatory proposals that have been made to redistribute wealth.

I have made no reference to the dangerous precedent which this measure establishes. It is an invitation to all distressed industries to invoke the same principle of relief. In my own State, as a result of overproduction, marginal producers, and unsteady employment, several industries are in the same plight as the coal industry; notably, the fish industry and the textile industry. If the attempt to relieve one industry, as proposed in this bill, should succeed, then, in justice to all producers and workers similarly situated, like legislation should be enacted as to them. The result is not difficult to foresee; namely, an increase in prices that would be staggering, a diminution in employment by reduction of purchasing power, and a final plight worse than the present one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to lay on the table the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. NEELY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, request a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. NEELY, Mr. BARKLEY, and Mr. DAVIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

CELEBRATION OF ANNIVERSARY OF HERNANDO DE SOTO EXPEDITION—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BARKLEY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 265) pertaining to an appropriate celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the expedition of Hernando De Soto, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments.

ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
KENNETH MCKELLAR,
PETER NORBECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

KENT E. KELLER,
ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
ROBERT T. SECREST,
BERT LORD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask at this point that there be taken up by the Senate and made the next order of business——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the fact that there is a unanimous-consent agreement that the Senate proceed to the call of the calendar for the consideration of unobjected bills following the disposition of the unfinished business, namely, the Guffey coal bill. So at this time the motion which the Senator indicates his purpose to offer is not in order.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Chair allow me to announce the title of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. The bill to which I refer is Senate bill 2665, a bill to change the name of the Department of the Interior and to coordinate certain governmental functions.

I gather from the announcement of the Chair that there has been a unanimous-consent agreement to proceed to a call of the calendar, and I take it I would be out of order in now moving the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At this time the motion would not be in order.

Mr. LEWIS. I give notice that I shall make the motion at the first opportunity after the completion of the call of the calendar.

CONTROL OF SOIL EROSION AND FLOOD DAMAGE

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on the 1st day of May of this year Senate bill 376 passed the Senate and was transmitted to the House. I am advised the House claims the bill was mislaid, and the House passed a bill identically the same as the Senate bill. A few days ago the House bill came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

If I had been advised that the House had passed this bill I should have moved to take up the House bill and substitute it for the Senate bill, and pass the House bill. I have asked the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry if he has any objection to my asking unanimous consent that his committee be discharged from the further consideration of the House bill and that we proceed to its consideration and have it passed, because it is textually the same as the bill which passed the Senate on May 1.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, there is so much confusion in the Senate that I have been unable to understand the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will repeat his statement.

Mr. KING. On the 1st day of May of this year Senate bill 376, for the purpose of dealing with the flood situation which damaged the highways in Utah, calling for a small appropriation, was passed. The bill was recommended by the Forest Service, because it was for their protection, inasmuch as the floods washed out forest lands and inundated national highways, which cost the Government a large sum of money.

The bill was unanimously reported by the committee of the Senate, was unanimously passed, and was transmitted to the House. Unfortunately, the House lost the bill.

A bill textually the same was introduced in the House by one of the Representatives from Utah, and passed the House unanimously and came to the Senate a few days ago, but inadvertently it was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I was not in the Chamber when it was received, or I should have moved to have it substituted for the Senate bill and passed.

I now ask that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be discharged from the further consideration of the House bill, and that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 4339) to facilitate control of soil erosion and/or flood damage originating upon lands within the exterior boundaries of the Uintah and Wasach National Forests, Utah, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into earlier in the day the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar, and the clerk will state the first bill in order.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 944) to amend section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act was announced as first in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 213) to amend section 113 of the Criminal Code of March 4, 1909, 35 Stat. 1109 (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 203), and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1506) to change the name of Pickwick Landing Dam to Quin Dam, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MACK COPPER CO.

The bill (S. 1878) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of the Mack Copper Co. was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims of the United States, notwithstanding the lapse of time, prior consideration, or any statute of limitation, to hear and determine the claim of the Mack Copper Co. against the United States for just compensation for the taking and use, and the damages and waste inflicted by the taking and use, of certain real property owned by the Mack Copper Co. and situated in San Diego County, State of California, which real property was taken, used, and occupied by the United States as an Army cantonment, training camp, or for other military purposes during the period from on or about May 15, 1917, to on or about June 1, 1922, not heretofore paid by the United States to the Mack Copper Co.

SEC. 2. That the Court of Claims of the United States, in the hearing and determination of any suit prosecuted under the authority of this act, is authorized, in its discretion, to use and consider as evidence in such suit, together with any other evidence which may be taken therein, the testimony and other evidence filed by Mack Copper Co. and the United States, respectively, in case no. D-134 on the docket of that court entitled "Mack Copper Co. against the United States", wherein the court rendered a judgment on the 6th day of June 1927.

SEC. 3. From any decision or judgment rendered in any suit presented under the authority of this act, a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States may be applied for by either party thereto, as is provided by law in other cases.

BILLS AND RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 574) relative to Members of Congress acting at attorneys in matters where the United States has an interest was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there has been a full explanation of this bill, and debate on it. I think the Senator from Michigan might now join me, perhaps, in an effort to pass the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator stated that the bill is for the conservation of natural resources. I find that it is for the conservation and development of the natural human and other resources of the Nation. Would the Senator be willing to amend the bill on page 2, line 24, by striking out the words "human and other", so that it shall not become a blanket commission to five $12,000-a-year men to do anything they want to do with the regimentation of the life of the Nation?

Mr. KING. Even with that eliminated, I shall object.

Mr. COPELAND. I am sorry, because, if I could, I should like to say to the Senator from Michigan that I should accept his suggestion.

INTEREST AND USURY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3097) relating to interest and usury affecting parties under the jurisdiction of courts of the United States functioning in countries where the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] tendered an amendment to this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 1, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, however, That in no case shall such rate of interest be more than 12 percent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to parties subject to the jurisdiction of courts of the United States in countries where the United States exercises over its citizens extraterritorial jurisdiction, the rate of interest within the said jurisdiction upon the loan or forbearance of any money, goods, or things in action, and the rate to be allowed in judgments and decrees, in the absence of express contract as to such rate of interest, shall be the legal rate of interest provided by the laws of the country in which such jurisdiction is exercised and in effect at the time of such transaction: Provided, however, That in no case shall such rate of interest be more than 12 percent.

SEC. 2. In any such jurisdictions the parties to a bond, bill, promissory note, or other instrument of writing for the payment of money at any future time may contract therein for the payment of interest on the principal amount thereof at any rate not exceeding the lawful or contractual rate of interest allowed by the laws of the country in which such jurisdiction is exercised and in effect at the time of the making of such bond, bill, promissory note, or other instrument in writing.

SEC. 3. If any person or corporation within and subject to any such jurisdictions shall contract verbally to pay a greater rate of interest than that provided in section 1 hereof, shall contract, in writing, to pay a greater rate than that provided in section 2 hereof, the creditor shall forfeit the whole of the interest so contracted to be received.

SEC. 4. If any person or corporation subject to any such jurisdictions shall directly or indirectly take or receive any greater amount of interest, than is herein declared to be lawful, whether in advance or not, the person or corporation paying the same shall be entitled to sue for and recover the amount of the unlawful interest so paid from the person or corporation receiving the same, provided said suit be begun within 1 year from the date of such payment.

SEC. 5. In action brought in any courts of the United States in any such jurisdiction upon any contract for the payment of money with interest at a rate forbidden by law, as aforesaid, any payments of interest that may have been made on account of said contract shall be deemed and taken to be payments made on account of the principal debt, and judgment shall be rendered for no more than the balance found due after deducting and properly crediting the interest so paid; but no bona fide indorsee of negotiable paper purchased before due shall be affected by any usury exacted by any former holder of said paper unless he had notice of the usury before his purchase.

SEC. 6. Whenever in actions in any such jurisdictions to recover a debt the defendant shall claim that payments of unlawful interest on said debt have been made to said plaintiff or those under whom he claims, which the defendant is entitled to have credited on the principal of the debt, the plaintiff or the party who received said unlawful interest may be examined as a witness to prove the payment of the same, and shall not be excused from testifying in relation thereto, nor shall a creditor who is made defendant to a bill in equity exhibited against him for discovery as to payments of unlawful interest made to him be excused from answering as to the same.

SEC. 7. In actions in any such jurisdictions to recover a liquidated debt on which interest is payable by contract or by law or usage the judgment for the plaintiff shall include interest on the principal debt from the time when it was due and payable, at the rate fixed by the contract, if any, until paid.

SEC. 8. In actions in any such jurisdictions to recover damages for breach of contract the judgment shall allow interest on the amount for which it is rendered from the date of the judgment only; but nothing herein shall forbid the court from including interest as an element in the damages awarded, if necessary to fully compensate the plaintiff. In an action to recover damages for a wrong the judgment for the plaintiff shall bear interest.

SEC. 9. In actions in any such jurisdictions, on a contract for the payment of a higher rate of interest than is lawful in any of said jurisdictions where such action is brought, made, or to be performed in any State, Territory, or possession of the United States where such contract rate of interest is lawful, the judgment for the plaintiff shall include such contract interest to the date of the judgment and interest thereafter at the rate of interest provided in section 1 hereof until paid.

SEC. 10. This act shall apply only to persons, firms, corporations, etc., subject to and within the jurisdiction of any court of the United States functioning in any country where the United States maintains courts under extraterritorial treaties.

BANKRUPTCY RELIEF OF URBAN HOME OWNERS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3049) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, Senate bill 3049, to amend section 74 of the Bankruptcy Act, is a companion bill to the one which was passed a few days ago, Senate bill 3002. This bill deals with bankruptcy cases of home owners in cities, towns, and business organizations which are not corporations. There are a great many homes throughout the Nation which are threatened with foreclosure. Many have been foreclosed. The terms of this bill are practically the same as those of the bill passed the other day having to do with the amendment of section 75 with regard to bankruptcy in farms. I hope this bill will be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the committee will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in section 1, page 1, line 3, after the word "subsection", to strike out "(h)" and insert "(l)", and after line 6 to insert:

(e) An application for the confirmation of a composition or extension proposal may be filed in the court of bankruptcy after, but not before, it has been accepted in writing by a majority in number of all creditors whose claims if unsecured have been allowed, or if secured are proposed to be affected by an extension proposal, which number must represent a majority in amount of such claims.

So as to make the section read:

That subsection (l) of section 74 of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", as amended, is amended as follows:

"(e) An application for the confirmation of a composition or extension proposal may be filed in the court of bankruptcy after, but not before, it has been accepted in writing by a majority in number of all creditors whose claims if unsecured have been allowed, or if secured are proposed to be affected by an extension proposal, which number must represent a majority in amount of such claims."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 4, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 74 of this act be further amended by amending subsection (f) to read as follows:

"(f) A date and place, with reference to the convenience of the parties in interest, shall be fixed for a hearing upon each application for the confirmation of the composition or extension proposal, and such objections as may be made to its confirmation. The court may require claims to be signed under oath and filed by the creditor, setting forth the claim, the consideration paid therefor, and if the claimant holds his claim by virtue of an assignment or transfer from the original holder of the claim, when such claim was acquired. Claims of secured creditors shall be scrutinized by the court with a view of ascertaining whether or not the securities upon which the claim is founded were purchased or acquired after default or after maturity and may limit such claims to the actual consideration paid therefor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 20, to insert:

SEC. 3. That section 74 of this act be further amended by amending subsection (h), as follows: On page 3, line 1, after the word "or", to strike out "of the custodian or receiver" and insert "a custodian or receiver or trustee"; in line 16, after the article "a", to strike out "corporation" and insert "corporate"; and in line 24, after the word "composition", to insert and/or extension", so as to make the section read:

"SEC. 3. That section 74 of this act be further amended by amending subsection (h), as follows:

"'(h) The terms of an extension proposal may extend the time of payment of either or both unsecured debts and secured debts the security for which is in the actual or constructive possession of the debtor or a custodian or receiver or trustee, and may provide for priority of payments to be made during the period of extension as between secured and unsecured creditors. It may also include specific undertakings by the debtor during the period of the extension, including provisions for payments on account, and may provide for supervisory or other control over the debtor's business or affairs during such period by a creditors' committee or otherwise, and for the termination of such period under certain specified conditions:

"'1. A composition proposal may provide for the modifying or altering of the rights of creditors generally, or any class of them, secured or unsecured, either through the issuance of new securities of any character, or otherwise, and may provide for the creation of a corporate entity or entities to which the property of the debtor or any part thereof may be transferred, and the obligations of such corporate entity may be exchanged for the obligations of the debtors, provided the majority of secured creditors, whose claims are secured by the property so transferred, holding a majority in amount of such claims have consented in writing to the proposal.

"'2. Before or after a proposal for composition and/or extension is confirmed, changes and modifications may be by the debtors or by the corporate entity created; and all certificates of deposit representing securities of all claims against the debtors, which it is proposed to deal with any such plan, shall be exempt from all the provisions by the Securities Act of 1933, approved May 27, 1933, except the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 12 and section 17 thereof, and except the provisions of section 24 thereof as applied to any willful violation of said section 17.'"

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 9, to change the section number from 2 to 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 21, to change the section number from 3 to 5; on page 6, line 7, after the word "exemptions" and the comma, to insert "and unencumbered interest or equity in his exemptions,"; in line 11, after the word "property" and the comma, to insert "including his encumbered exemptions,"; on page 7, line 2, after the word "exemptions" and the comma, to insert "and his unencumbered interest or equity in his exemptions,"; in line 8, after the word "encumbrances", to insert "which"; in line 12, after the word "appear", to strike out the comma and "up to the actual value of such property, as fixed by the appraisals provided for in this section"; in line 15, after the word "court", to insert "may stay, except in the case of a home occupied by the debtor, and his household effects, in which case the court"; in line 20, after the word "years", to insert a comma and "except as hereinafter provided"; on page 8, line 9, after the word "appear" and the period, to insert "When the annual net rental exceeds 5 percent of the appraised value of the property the excess shall be applied in reduction of the indebtedness as established by the appraised value of the property and paid to the secured and unsecured creditors, as their interests may appear."; on page 9, line 1, after the word "and", to insert "with a view to"; in line 14, after the word "view", to strike out "of" and insert "to"; in line 18, after the word "the", to strike out "amount of"; in line 19, after the word "the" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "appraisal" and insert "appraised value less payments made on the principal"; on page 10, after line 5, after the word "debtor", to insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That upon request in writing by any secured or unsecured creditor or creditors, the court in its discretion, if it deems it for the best interests of the secured creditors and the debtor, may order the property upon which such secured creditors have a lien to be sold at public auction; but no mortgagee or lienholder shall be permitted to bid on any property at such sale, in excess of the appraised value, or the original principal less payments whichever is the higher. The debtor shall have 90 days to redeem any property sold at such sale, by paying the amount for which any such property was sold, together with 5 percent per annum interest, into court,"; on the same page, line 20, after the word "and", to insert "order"; and in line 21, after the word "sold", to insert "or otherwise disposed of", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That section 74 of said act be further amended by amending subsection (L) as follows:

"(L) If the debtor fails to obtain the acceptance of a majority in number and amount of all creditors whose claims are affected by a composition and/or extension proposal, or if he feels aggrieved by the composition and/or extension, then he may apply to the court for adjudication. Such debtor may at the same time or at the time of the first hearing petition the court that all his property, wherever located, whether pledged, encumbered, or unencumbered, be appraised, and that his unencumbered exemptions and unencumbered interest or equity in his exemptions, as prescribed by law, be set aside to him, and that he be allowed to retain possession, under the supervision and control of the court, of any part or parcel or all of the remainder of his property, including his encumbered exemptions, under the terms and conditions set forth in this section. Upon such a request being made the referee, under the jurisdiction of the court, shall designate and appoint appraisers, as provided for in this act. Such appraisers shall appraise all of the property of the debtor, wherever located, at its then fair and reasonable market value. The appraisals shall be made in all other respects, with rights of objections, exceptions, and appeals, in accordance with this act, provided that in proceedings under this section, either party may file objections, exceptions, and take appeals within 3 months from the date that the referee approves the appraisal.

"1. After the value of the debtor's property shall have been fixed by the appraisal herein provided, the referee shall issue an order setting aside to such debtor his unencumbered exemptions and his unencumbered interest or equity in his exemptions, as prescribed by the State law, and shall further order that the possession, under the supervision and control of the court, of any part or parcel or all of the remainder of the debtor's property shall remain in the debtor, as herein provided for, subject to all existing mortgages, liens, pledges, or encumbrances which shall remain in full force and effect, and the property covered by such mortgages, liens, pledges, or encumbrances shall be subject to the payment of the claims of the secured creditors as their interests may appear.

"2. When the conditions set forth in this section have been complied with, the court may stay, except in the case of a home occupied by the debtor, and his household effects, in which case the court shall stay all judicial or official proceedings in any court, or under the direction of any official, against the debtor or any of his property, for a period of 3 years, except as hereinafter provided. During such 3 years the debtor shall be permitted to retain possession of all or any part of his property, in the custody and under the supervision and control of the court, provided he pays a reasonable rental semiannually for that part of the property of which he retains possession. The first payment of such rental shall be made within 6 months of the date of the order staying proceedings, the amount and kind of such rental to be the usual customary rental in the community where the property is located, based upon the rental value, net income, and earning capacity of the property. Such rental shall be paid into court, to be used, first, for payment of taxes and upkeep of the property, and the remainder to be distributed among the secured and unsecured creditors, as their interests may appear. When the annual net rental exceeds 5 percent of the appraised value of the property the excess shall be applied in reduction of the indebtedness as established by the appraised value of the property and paid to the secured and unsecured creditors, as their interests may appear.

"3. The court, in its discretion, if it deems it necessary to protect the creditors from loss by the estate, and/or to conserve the security, the property, or business of the debtor, except in the case of the home and/or household effects of the debtor or his family, may, in addition to the rental, require payments on the principal due and owing by the debtor to unsecured or secured creditors, as their interests may appear, in accordance with the provisions of this act, and may require that such payments be made quarterly, semiannually, or annually, not inconsistent with the protection of the creditors, and with a view to the financial rehabilitation of the debtor.

"In case of the home and/or household effects of the debtor or his family, the court may, in its discretion, if it deems it necessary to protect the creditors from loss by the estate and/or to conserve the security for the creditors, and the home and household effects for the debtor or his family, require payments on the principal due and owing by the debtor to the secured or unsecured creditors, as their interests may appear, in accordance with the provisions of this act, and may require that such payments be made monthly, quarterly, semiannually, or annually, not inconsistent with the protection of the rights of the creditors, and the debtor's ability to pay, with a view to his financial rehabilitation.

"4. At the end of 3 years, or prior thereto, the debtor may pay into court the amount of the appraisal on any part or parcel or all of the property of which he retains possession, including the encumbrances on his exemptions, up to the amount of the appraised value less payments made on the principal: Provided, That upon request of any secured or unsecured creditor, or upon request of the debtor, the court shall cause a reappraisal of the debtor's property, or in its discretion set a day for hearing, and after such hearing fix the value of the property according to the evidence submitted, and the debtor shall then pay the value so arrived at into court, and thereupon the court shall, by an order, turn over full possession and title of said property, free and clear of encumbrances, to the debtor: Provided, That upon request in writing by any secured or unsecured creditor or creditors, the court in its discretion, if it deems it for the best interests of the secured creditors and the debtor, may order the property upon which such secured creditors have a lien to be sold at public auction; but no mortgagee or lienholder shall be permitted to bid on any property at such sale, in excess of the appraised value, or the original principal less payments, whichever is the higher. The debtor shall have 90 days to redeem any property sold at such sale, by paying the amount for which any such property was sold, together with 5 percent per annum interest, into court, and he may apply for his discharge, as provided for by this act. If, however, the debtor at any time fails to comply with the provisions of this section, and is unable to be refinanced within the 3 years, the court may order the appointment of a trustee, and order the property sold or otherwise disposed of as provided for in this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 23, to change the section number from 4 to 6; on page 11, line 12, after the word "expired" and the comma, to insert "or where a deed of trust has been given as security,"; and on page 12, line 1, after the word "expired", to insert a comma and "or where the right under a deed of trust has not or had not become absolute", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That section 74 of said act be further amended by amending subsection (m) to read as follows:

"(m) The filing of a petition or answer with the clerk of court, or leaving it with the referee for the purpose of forwarding same to the clerk of court, praying for relief under section 74 of this act, as amended, shall immediately subject the debtor and all his property, wherever located, for all the purposes of this section, to the exclusive jurisdiction of the court, including all real or personal property, or any equity or right in any such property, including, among others, contracts for purchase, contracts for deed, or conditional sales contracts, the right or equity of redemption, where the period of redemption has not or had not expired, or where a deed of trust has been given as security, or where the sale had not been confirmed, or where deed had not been delivered, at the time of the filing of the petition, and this shall include property of the debtor in the possession of a trustee under a trust deed or a mortgage, or a receiver, custodian, or other officer of any court in a pending cause, irrespective of the date of appointment of such receiver or other officer or the date of the institution of such proceedings: Provided, That it shall not affect any proceeding in any court in which a final decree has been entered, the property sold, the period of redemption expired, and a deed issued to the purchaser. In all cases where, at the time of filing the petition, the period of redemption has not or had not expired, or where the right under a deed of trust has not or had not become absolute or where the sale has not or had not been confirmed, or where deed had not been delivered, the period of redemption shall be extended, or the confirmation of sale withheld, for the period necessary for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section.

"The words 'period of redemption', wherever they occur in this section, shall include any State moratorium, whether established by legislative enactment or executive proclamation, or where the period of redemption has been extended by a judicial decree. In proceedings under this section, except as otherwise provided herein, the jurisdiction and powers of the courts, the title, powers, and duties of its officers, the duties of the debtor, and rights and liabilities of creditors, and of all persons with respect to the property of the debtor, and the jurisdiction of the appellate courts shall be the same as if a voluntary petition for adjudication had been filed, and the decree of adjudication had been entered, on the day when the debtor's petition asking to be adjudged a bankrupt was filed with the clerk of court, or left with the referee for the purpose of forwarding same to the clerk of court."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 24, to change the section number from 5 to 7; on page 13, line 7, after the word "estate", to insert "Conciliation commissioners and referees appointed under this act shall be entitled to transmit in the mails, free of postage, under cover of a penalty envelop, all matters which relate exclusively to the business of the courts, including notices to creditors"; and in line 23, after the word "this", where it occurs the second time, to strike out "section" and insert "act", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That section 74 of said act be further amended by amending subsection (n) to read as follows:

"(n) In case the debtor's estate consists only of a home and household and personal effects of himself and family, then the filing fee shall be $10, in place of the regular filing free provided for in this act. The referee shall receive such additional fee for his services as may be allowed by the court, not to exceed $35 in any case, to be paid out of the bankrupt's estate. Conciliation commissioners and referees appointed under this act shall be entitled to transmit in the mails, free of postage, under cover of a penalty envelop, all matters which relate exclusively to the business of the courts, including notices to creditors. No additional fees or costs of administration or supervision of any kind shall be charged against the debtor when or after he applies to the court for adjudication, but all such additional filing fees or costs of administration or supervision shall be charged against the bankrupt's estate. If, at the time that the debtor applies for adjudication, a receiver is in charge of any of his property, such receiver shall be divested of possession, and the property returned to the possession of the debtor under the provisions of this act. This act shall apply to all existing cases now pending in any Federal court under this section, as well as to future cases filed under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 24, to change the section number from 6 to 8.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 6, to change the section number from 7 to 9; in line 11, after the word "petition" and the period, to strike out "Involuntary proceedings under this section shall not be taken against a wage earner", and in line 14, after the word "measure", to strike out "Due to the depression, hundreds and thousands of home owners and small business men are threatened with foreclosure and loss of their homes and property at prices equivalent to confiscation, due to no fault of their own, thus adding to the army of unemployed. It is common knowledge that there is no adequate system of credit whereby these debtors can refinance their existing debts, and save their property and their homes. Therefore, since the stability of government itself depends upon the ownership of homes, this act shall be liberally construed, so as to protect the rights of the creditors, and at the same time with a view to the rehabilitation of the debtors, by giving them time within which to refinance their loans, when the usual credit once more is obtainable. If such a time should arrive prior to the 3-year period provided for in this act, during which the debtor may retain possession of his property, and that fact is made to appear clearly to the court, then the court may shorten the stay of proceedings herein provided for to such time as will accomplish the purposes set forth herein" and insert "If, in the judgment of the court, such emergency ceases to exist in its locality, then the court, in its discretion, may shorten the stay or proceedings herein provided for, and proceed to liquidate the estate", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That section 74 of this act be further amended by amending subsection (p) to read as follows:

"(p) The provisions of this section shall be held to apply to partnerships, common, entirety, joint, or community ownerships, and any such parties may join in one petition.

"This act is hereby declared to be an emergency measure. If, in the judgment of the court, such emergency ceases to exist in its locality, then the court, in its discretion, may shorten the stay or proceedings herein provided for, and proceed to liquidate the estate."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DIRECTOR OF COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY

The bill (S. 3281) to amend the act of February 16, 1929, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to readjust the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service', approved June 10, 1922, as amended", was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill be passed over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask the Senator who objected to this bill to withhold his objection.

Mr. KING. I withhold the objection.

Mr. COPELAND. This measure, Senate bill 3281, was the subject of hearings in the Department of Commerce, and has been considered briefly upon the floor. It seeks merely to confer upon this important service the same privileges which are given to employees in the Public Health Service, where the highly specialized duties have been recognized. It is confined to the appointment of a director, and limits the appointment of director to officers of the Bureau's own commissioned force in the grades of captain and commander. At the present time the Director of this Bureau receives the pay and allowances of a rear admiral (lower half), while similar positions in all other commissioned services carry the rank and pay of a rear admiral (upper half). The bill is proposed in order that there may be a stimulation to the activities of the Department and the hope of some promotions which would be exactly in line with those now given to the officers of the Public Health Service.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does the Senator see any justification—and I ask for information rather than by way of criticism—for giving persons who are engaged in what might be denominated private work, though it is of a governmental character, the grades and allowances and titles, so to speak, of men in the Army and in the Navy?

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator certainly does not consider that the work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey is work of a private character. It has exactly the same application in its field that the Public Health Service has to the protection of public health, to the protection of individuals who may hire private physicians. It is a very important service, and we were impressed in the Committee on Commerce that it was a deserving matter; and I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KING. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act of February 16, 1929, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to readjust the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service', approved June 10, 1922, as amended", be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the Director of the Coast and Geodetic Survey shall be appointed and hold office as now authorized by law; his appointment shall not create a vacancy, and while holding said office he shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a Chief of Bureau of the Navy Department."

VACATIONS TO GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

The bill (H. R. 8458) to provide for vacations to Government employees, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Over.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, did the Senator from Tennessee object?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. May I state, if the Senator will permit me to do so, that I have the following statement from the Department:

Reference is made to bill H. R. 8458, introduced by Mr. RAMSPECK, providing 30 days' annual leave with pay each calendar year, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, to Government employees, and to bill H. R. 8459, introduced by Mr. RAMSPECK, standardizing sick leave and extending it to all civilian employees, which in effect grants sick leave at the rate of 15 days each year, and to their effect upon the employees in the field services of the Navy Department and the United States Marine Corps.

Under the provisions of section 23 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1935, passed March 28, 1934, all per diem laborers, helpers, mechanics, and supervisory laborers and mechanics in the field services of the Navy Department and the United States Marine Corps, numbering 48,751, work 5 days, or 40 hours each week, for which they receive 6 days, or 48 hours' pay, i. e., they receive pay for 52 Saturdays for which they perform no work.

We have just passed a 40-hour-week bill for the postal employees, and that is what these employees now work, 40 hours each week, for which they receive pay for 6 days or 48 hours; that is, they receive pay for 52 Saturdays for which they perform no service.

The above-mentioned employees also receive pay for 15 days' annual leave each year and for 7 legal holidays, making a total of 74 secular days each year on which they do not work but for which they receive pay. Bill H. R. 8458 contemplates allowing 15 days additional annual leave with pay to these employees and bill H. R. 8459 contemplates allowing them 15 days' sick leave each year with pay.

Should the provisions of the above-mentioned bills become law, it will mean that these employees who now work 5 days each week, will have 30 days' annual leave and 15 days' sick leave with pay, which will practically make a 4-day work week for them.

The above-mentioned conditions would also apply to employees in the clerical, drafting, technical, inspection, messenger, and police forces in the field services of the Navy Department and the United States Marine Corps, numbering 8,439, who, because of the act of March 28, 1934, and a decision of the Comptroller General, generally work, under administrative order, 5 days each week. These employees are now entitled to the 15 days' sick leave with pay.

The annual cost of the additional 15 days' annual leave to laborers, helpers, mechanics, and supervisory laborers and mechanics in the field services of the Navy Department and the United States Marine Corps would be approximately $4,600,000. There will be no additional cost for this leave to employees in the clerical, drafting, technical, inspection, messenger, and police forces, as the work not performed by employees because of such leave will be performed by those employees who remain on duty.

The annual cost of the 15 days' sick leave to laborers, helpers, and mechanics, and supervisory laborers and mechanics, who are not now granted sick leave, would be approximately $4,600,000. If the employees average only 7 days' sick leave each year, the cost would be approximately $2,200,000. It is understood that it is not the practice of private industrial concerns to grant sick leave with pay to industrial workers. There would be no additional cost for sick leave to employees of the clerical, drafting, technical, inspection, messenger, and police forces, as they now receive 15 days' sick leave with pay.

It is understood that certain exceptions from the provisions of the above-mentioned bills have been submitted; among them one excepting certain Post Office Department employees because they have just recently been legislatively placed on a 5-day work week of 40 hours.

It is suggested that all employees in the field services of the Navy Department and the United States Marine Corps be likewise excepted in the following language in bills H. R. 8458 and H. R. 8459:

"SEC. 5. Nothing in this act shall affect the civilian employees in the field services of the Navy Department and the United States Marine Corps."

Sections 5, 6, and 7 of each bill should be renumbered 6, 7, and 8, respectively.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand the Senator objects to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I do.

I desire to call attention to a letter just received from the Post Office Department, reading as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR,
Washington, August 22, 1935.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: I am sending herewith a copy of a letter addressed to me by the Honorable S. W. Purdum, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, referring to H. R. 8458 and H. R. 8459, standardizing annual and sick leave for Government employees.

The suggested amendments place the employees of the mail equipment shops of the Post Office Department on the same basis as other field employees of the Post Office Department with respect to annual and sick leave.

Very truly yours,

KARL A. CROWLEY, Solicitor.

The enclosure reads:

AUGUST 16, 1935.

The SOLICITOR,
Post Office Department.

Referring to H. R. 8458 and H. R. 8459, standardizing annual and sick leave for Government employees, it is believed that employees of the mail equipment shops of this bureau are entitled to receive 15 days' annual and 10 days' sick leave, the same as provided for all other field-service employees of this Department.

The Department has heretofore recommended during the last calendar year and the present calendar year that employees of the mail equipment shops be granted 10 days' sick leave.

The act fixing the hours of duty of postal employees, and for other purposes, which was approved August 14, 1935, included employees of the mail equipment shops.

Will you please take the necessary action to either have the bills referred to amended to accomplish the desired result, or have a special bill introduced and push it to passage at this session of Congress?

S. W. PURDUM, Fourth Assistant.

These employees receive no sick leave and no annual leave, and yet we are asked to give other Government employees 30 days' annual leave and 15 days' sick leave and to reduce their days of work to 4 days a week. It is indefensible and the bill ought not to be passed. No bill along this line should be passed until we treat all the employees of the Government alike. If we are going to give one class of our employees a 4-day week, we ought to give it to all of them. We ought to treat them alike. We ought not to give these benefits to certain classes of our employees whose lobbyists flock around the Capitol and take it away from other employees who do not have lobbyists to look after their affairs.

I object to the present consideration of the bill and I shall continue to object, I serve notice, until all employees of the Government shall be treated fairly and justly and alike.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withhold his objection, since he has made a speech, so that some of the rest of us may comment upon the matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I withhold my objection for the benefit of the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator said that Government employees should be treated alike. I think he misunderstands about the matter of leave to employees. When we say "30 days' leave", that does not mean a month off for vacation. Every time they are half an hour late or take half a day off or an hour off to see the dentist or the doctor, that is leave which is charged against them.

Mr. President, I think this is a very just bill. If the Senator from Tennessee is going to use his efforts forever to try to defeat these measures, so far as I am concerned I am going to use my efforts to have them enacted into law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, all I want is to have the employees of the Federal Government treated alike, and I am going to use every effort to see that that is done. If I can prevent it, I am not going to permit some of them to be given a most favorable situation and that favorable situation withheld from others.

I think the Civil Service Committee ought to have hearings and take proof from each and every department so that all the civil-service employees may be treated exactly alike so far as leave is concerned. The leave should be the same in each department and it should apply to all employees. I believe that proper consideration has not been given to the bill. I believe it can be considered in another session of Congress, but that the two bills ought to go over until equal justice can be done to all employees.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is very successful in his efforts. He is treating them alike. He is depriving all of them of leave, and I say that is not fair.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not understand what he is talking about when he says they are deprived of leave. I insist upon my objection.

Mr. KING. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being heard, the bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 8459) to standardize sick leave and extend to all civilian employees was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

EDGAR SAMPSON

The bill (H. R. 921) for the relief of Edgar Sampson was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 15, 17, and 20 of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended (U. S. C., title 5, pars. 765, 767, and 770, on p. 79), are hereby waived in favor of Edgar Sampson, who is alleged to have sustained disability as the result of his employment in the United States Post Office, Brooklyn, N. Y., growing out of 43 certain contracts dated on and between January 28, 1920, and September 24, 1920, for the manufacture and delivery by said company to the War Department of certain material and parts for class B military trucks, said just compensation to include losses or damages suffered by said company due to procuring and supplying dies, tools, equipment, etc., in compliance, with agreement had with officers of the War Department to give said company additional orders for parts for class B military trucks, notwithstanding any failure or error of any Government official to give orders in the form required by law, or to give proper written orders for changes made in any of said contracts, or fix the value thereof, or any previous decisions or decrees rendered with reference thereto, or any alleged settlement or adjustment heretofore made, or termination agreement, except for proper credits to be given for any and all payments heretofore made: Provided, That suit shall be commenced within 4 months after this act becomes effective.

Mr. ROBINSON. Over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. I cannot consent to the consideration of the bill. However, if the Senator wishes to make a statement, I am willing to withhold my objection for the moment.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator is set upon his objection I shall not ask that privilege.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I am unwilling to consent to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On objection, the bill will be passed over.

CLAIMS OF MILITARY PERSONNEL FOR DAMAGES TO PROPERTY

The bill (H. R. 4852) to authorize the settlement of individual claims of military personnel for damages to and loss of private property incident to training, practice, operation, or maintenance of the Army was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2983) to amend the Plant Quarantine Act of August 20, 1912, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] explain the bill? [A pause.] If not, let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3420) to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, by providing for the regulation of the transportation of passengers and property by aircraft in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1634) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. That bill has been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill should be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest that that be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

WILLIAM K. CALEY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6394) for the relief of William K. Caley, which was read.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, quite naturally in the closing hours of Congress Members scrutinize claims closely. That is to be expected. Therefore, possibly I should say a word about this claim.

Some years ago the claimant, Mr. Caley, received in due course a contract with the Government to carry the mail on a star-route line from Bisbee, Ariz., to Bisbee Junction. Acting upon that contract, believing the Government was acting in good faith, he purchased a truck and a chassis and, I think paid down five-hundred-and-some-odd dollars upon them; whereupon the Government changed its mind—as it had a right to do, I suppose—and canceled the contract.

This claim has been passed on by the House of Representatives and other authorities and has been found to be a just claim. It is to reimburse Mr. Caley for what he actually paid out in purchasing the equipment to make good on carrying the mail under his contract. The amount involved is $575.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RUFUS JONES

The bill (H. R. 3408) for the relief of Rufus Jones, a minor, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am familiar with the provisions of this bill. I ask the Senator from Utah to withhold his objection.

Mr. KING. I withhold it.

Mr. ROBINSON. This is a very meritorious case. A minor was traveling on the highway and was struck and seriously injured by a vehicle operated in connection with the Civilian Conservation Corps, the vehicle being on official business. This occurred on July 10, 1934. The bill is limited to a very reasonable amount. The guardian of the youth expended $63 for medical service, and the allowance is of $3,000 in addition thereto. I hope the Senator will not make an objection.

Mr. KING. I withdraw the objection

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOE RENO

The bill (H. R. 996) for the relief of Joe Reno was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEDICAL COLLEGE OF VIRGINIA, AND OTHERS

EMANUEL LIEBERMAN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2702) for the relief of Emanuel Lieberman, which was read.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of this bill. I find that the alleged injury occurred away back in 1919. Why was not the claim presented until such a long time had elapsed?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I am unable to say why there was such a long delay. We have here the full report of the House committee. The bill was considered by the Senate committee and reported on the strength of the considerations set out in the House report. The report of the Postmaster General on the bill concludes with these words:

> The Bureau of the Budget advises that this report to your committee would not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

The bill was well supported; and, beyond that, I am not prepared to say just why there was delay in filing the claim. In looking over the report I do not see any special explanation of the delay.

Mr. KING. It would seem that a claim presented 12 or 15 years or more after the alleged accident would not only be barred by the statute of limitations but would be rather inequitable unless opportunity had been given the Government, within a reasonable time after the alleged injury, to obtain information which might negative the evidence, if there were affirmative evidence.

Mr. BAILEY. There is no explanation in the report as to why there was delay, so I cannot answer the question. There is no doubt that a long time elapsed.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator whether or not the bill has been heretofore introduced in the House? Probably the bill never got through both bodies at the same time, but got through one or the other.

Mr. BAILEY. The affidavits are dated as far back as 1921, and the facts are fully set out in House Report 1293, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session.

Mr. KING. I withdraw the objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GLADYS PICKLESIMER

The bill (H. R. 4601) for the relief of the heirs of Gladys Picklesimer was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES K. SHADE

The bill (H. R. 6168) for the relief of Charles K. Shade was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JULIA M. CROWELL

The bill (H. R. 6402) for the relief of Julia M. Crowell was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, from what I observe in the report, it is alleged that the accident occurred away back in 1916. I do not see any reason why so long a time should have elapsed before the consideration of the claim.

Mr. BAILEY. Has the Senator the report before him?

Mr. KING. I have.

Mr. BAILEY. The report begins:

> The bill provides that the United States Employees' Compensation Commission be authorized and directed to extend to Julia M. Crowell, widow of Hiram M. Crowell, an employee of the United States Shipping Board as master of the steamship Tuscarora, the benefits of the Employees' Compensation Act approved September 7, 1916, as amended, in the same manner and to the same extent as the beneficiaries of other officers and members of the crew of the said steamship Tuscarora who were lost with the said vessel on or about December 8, 1917.

In the following paragraph the facts are stated. The case seemed to be a meritorious one. There was a failure, though perhaps not a right, to apply to the Shipping Board; but the committee felt, in view of all the circumstances, as the claimant's husband was employed by the Government, that she should have a right to submit her case to the Employees' Compensation Commission.

Mr. KING. I know; but it is so long afterward. I ask that the bill go over. I will look into it.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well. There is no question about its being a long time; but in this particular case, I remember it was stated that the lady did not know that she had the right to come to the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 6889) for the relief of A. Zappone and W. R. Fuchs was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSE R. REDLHAMMER

ELINORA FAREIRA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4770) for the relief of Elinora Fareira.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to this bill.

A few days ago a House bill was passed for the relief of one Mearon Perkins. He discovered a burglar in the post office on the morning of February 4, 1932, and at great risk to his life he disarmed the burglar, who had a pistol pointed at him, took the pistol away from him, and killed him, saving the post office from that robbery.

The Senate passed a bill allowing this man $1,800 as a reward, the Post Office Department having paid him $200 already, and I should like to offer that bill as an amendment to this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The amendment was, on page 2, after line 10, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,800 to Mearon Perkins, formerly a janitor in the El Centro Post Office, El Centro, Calif., in full satisfaction of all his claims against the United States for a reward for protecting the property of the United States on February 4, 1932, at great risk to his life, when he was compelled to shoot and kill one Alvin Self, an escaped convict, who was ransacking the package room of such post office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Bill for the relief of Elinora Fareira and Mearon Perkins."

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE, MISSOURI

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2075) to provide for the appointment of additional district judges for the eastern and western districts of Missouri, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert the following:

That the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one additional United States district judge, who shall be an additional district judge for the eastern and western districts of Missouri. The judge so appointed shall at the time of his appointment be a resident and citizen of the State of Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL YEOMEN F

The bill (S. 1687) to incorporate the National Yeomen F was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, the clerk was proceeding so rapidly that I did not know that Senate bill 1687 had been passed. I ask that the votes by which the bill was read the third time and passed be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the votes are reconsidered.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

The President pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, a few moments ago I objected to the consideration of Senate bill 1687 and Senate bill 2324, one being a bill introduced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] and the other being a bill introduced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]. I am advised that the organizations involved are patriotic organizations connected with the war, and therefore I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of Senate bill 1687?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1687) to incorporate the National Yeomen F was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

MILITARY ORDER OF THE PURPLE HEART

The bill (S. 2324) to incorporate the Military Order of the Purple Heart was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator in charge of this bill, or the Senator in charge of Calendar No. 1413, being Senate bill 1687, which was just passed.

In the Committee on the Judiciary for a number of years we have opposed the granting of national charters for organizations of this character. In my opinion, there is no justification for granting Federal charters for private organizations. They can be organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, they can be organized under the laws of any State, and obtain all of the privileges of incorporation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is correct about the historical fact to which he has alluded, that it is very rare for Congress ever to allow a national incorporation.

I remember that several years ago I introduced a bill to grant a Federal charter to the Rotary Clubs of America, one of the greatest of all the civic organizations in our country, and the proposal was turned down on the ground stated by the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I may say, furthermore, that a number of individuals who have secured Federal incorporation have obtained a prestige for their organization upon the basis that they were national organizations, and that they had national charters.

In my opinion, the Federal Government has no right to grant such charters except for public business, for the activities of the Federal Government, and to carry out the purposes for which the Federal Government was organized. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, I withdraw my objection to the consideration of Senate bill 2324 for the reasons stated regarding Senate bill 1687.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of Senate bill 2324?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2324) to incorporate the Military Order of the Purple Heart was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-named persons, to wit: Howard J. Lepper, New Jersey; George L. Apgar, New Jersey; D. Brandon Bernstein, California; Edgar N. Bloomer, New Jersey; William J. Edmonds, Pennsylvania; Joseph Godley, Michigan; L. E. Henry, Maryland; Kimon Karelis, Minnesota; Israel Kaufman, District of Columbia; F. K. Kennedy, Pennsylvania; John R. Lagana, Missouri; Carey D. Winterton, New Jersey; Carl Wirching, California; and such other persons as may be chosen who are holders of the Purple Heart Medal, awarded by the War Department under General Orders No. 3, dated February 22, 1932, duly chosen, are hereby incorporated and declared to be a body corporate. The name of this corporation shall be "The Military Order of the Purple Heart."

SEC. 2. The said persons named in section 1, and such other persons as may be selected from among those who have been awarded the Purple Heart Medal by the War Department, may complete the organization of said corporation by the selection of officers, the adoption of a constitution and bylaws, and do all other things necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and at any meeting for that purpose any person duly accredited as a delegate from any chapter or State department, known as "The Military Order of the Purple Heart", shall be permitted to participate in the proceedings thereof.

CLARENCE F. JOBSON

The bill (H. R. 5558) for the relief of Clarence F. Jobson was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in connection with the passage of House bill 5558, which, I may say, was one of the most appealing cases ever to come to my attention, I ask unanimous consent to have the report printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report (No. 1372), submitted by Mr. LEWIS on the 19th instant, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Report to accompany H. R. 5558]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5558) for the relief of Clarence F. Jobson, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

The purpose of this bill is to authorize the summoning of Clarence F. Jobson before a retiring board to inquire whether at the time of his discharge he was incapacitated for active service. If, as a result of such inquiry, it is found that he was so incapacitated, and such incapacity was a result of an incident of service, the bill authorizes the President to nominate and appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the said Jobson a captain of the Quartermaster Corps and place him on the retired list in that grade.

The claimant in this case was in the military service some 9 years, entering the Coast Artillery as a private on January 5, 1914, and serving until December 26, 1922, when he was retired under provisions of the acts of Congress approved June 30 and September 14, 1922, directing a reduction in the commissioned personnel of the Army. He accepted appointment as provisional second lieutenant, Regular Army, November 29, 1916, was made a provisional captain, June 4, 1917, and his appointment as captain was made permanent on August 8, 1919. During the World War, he served overseas, participating with the Eighteenth Infantry, First Division, in the Montdidier-Noyon, Aisne-Marne, St. Mihiel, and Meuse-Argonne operations, and also in the Ansauville sector. Captain Jobson was awarded the Purple Heart Decoration with one oak leaf cluster for wounds received in action May 3, 1918, and October 4, 1918.

On receiving notice of his selection for elimination, this former officer requested to be ordered before a retiring board because of alleged physical disabilities, stating that he was wounded in action May 1918 by an exploding shell and suffered a severe concussion and minor wounds on neck, and stating further that in October 1918 he was again wounded by being gassed with phosgene, his eyes and lungs being affected. Your committee in recommending this bill favorably calls attention to the fact that the War Department records show that he was thereupon examined by a board of medical officers November 21, 1922, and that this board concluded he was not fit for active field duty on account of various neurasthenic manifestations and that this condition was incident to the service and in line of duty. The board also recommended that he be brought before a retiring board. The records in the case were forwarded to the Surgeon General, who overruled the findings of the board of officers examining Jobson, expressing the opinion that the nervous disorder from which the officer was suffering was due to a constitutional psychopathic state which was a part of his physical make-up before entrance into the service.

Your committee feels that in view of the fact that this former officer was wounded on two different occasions in action, and in view of its belief that the board of medical officers examining Jobson personally was in a better position to determine whether he was of such physical condition as to be entitled to appear before a retiring board, this measure should be enacted, granting him a right to be heard and to present his case.

Your committee is brought to this conclusion also by the fact that 3 days after Jobson was separated from the service he was again examined by one of the medical officers who was a member of the disposition board before which he previously appeared at Fort Sam Houston, and that officer reported Captain Jobson was physically and mentally sound with the following exceptions: (1) Psychosis neurasthenia, manifested by headaches, dizziness, shortness of breath, defective memory, mental and physical fatigability, emotional instability, as evidenced by periods of depression, irritability; further manifested by unwillingness to accept responsibility, impairment of sexual powers, and inconstant changes in protopathic sensibility. (2) Functional cardiac disorder, extrasystole. This medical officer expressed the opinion that such disability originated in line of duty in the military service and that the officer was, in view of occupation, 50 percent disabled.

In view of these circumstances, your committee believes that this former officer is entitled from every point of view to present his case to a retiring board with a view to ascertaining whether at the time he was discharged he was incapacitated for active service, and whether such incapacity was an incident of service. If he was so incapacitated, general law would have entitled him to be retired for physical disability in the grade he was holding at the time of his separation from the service.

Report of the House Military Affairs Committee on H. R. 5558, House Report No. 1224, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, containing report of the War Department, follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5558) for the relief of Clarence F. Jobson, having considered the same, submit the following report thereon with the recommendation that it do pass:

This is a bill to authorize the President of the United States to summon Clarence F. Jobson, late captain of the Quartermaster Corps, Regular Army, before a retiring board, to inquire whether at the time of his discharge he was incapacitated for service, and whether such incapacity was incident to service. If it be found he was so incapacitated the President is authorized to nominate and appoint him, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a captain of the Quartermaster Corps, and place him immediately thereafter upon the retired list of the Army, with the same privileges and retired pay as are now, or may hereafter be, provided by law or regulation for officers of the Regular Army, provided, that under such circumstances he shall not be entitled to any back pay or allowances by reason of the passage of this act.

The report of the War Department is appended hereto, and the same, as will be observed, is in opposition to the enactment of this legislation. The committee takes notice of the reasons advanced by the War Department for its opposition to the enactment of this legislation, but in view of all the facts as set out in the report, is constrained to feel that a hearing should be had and an opportunity afforded for the said Clarence F. Jobson to present before a retiring board such statements of fact as he may care to adduce with respect to his capacity or incapacity for active service, and as to whether such incapacity, if any, was a result of and an incident of service.

The committee respectfully submits that it is not satisfied from a study of the report from the War Department and from the statements made before the committee as to the capacity or incapacity for active service of the officer named, nor as to whether such incapacity was a result of and an incident of service; it therefore feels that an opportunity should be had and given for a further hearing.

The report of the War Department is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 2, 1935.

Hon. JOHN J. MCSWAIN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MCSWAIN: Careful consideration has been given to the bill, H. R. 5558 (74th Cong., 1st sess.), for the relief of Clarence F. Jobson, which you transmitted to the War Department under date of February 19, 1935, with a request for information and the views of the Department relative thereto.

The proposed legislation authorizes the President to summon Clarence F. Jobson, former captain, Quartermaster Corps, Regular Army, before a retiring board to inquire whether at the time of his discharge he was incapacitated for active service, and whether such incapacity was a result of an incident of service. Upon the findings of such board the President is further authorized to appoint the beneficiary, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a captain in the Quartermaster Corps and place him immediately thereafter on the retired list of the Army.

Existing law applicable to the retirement of officers of the Regular Army for physical disability incident to the service is found in section 1251, Revised Statutes, which is quoted below:

"When a retiring board finds that an officer is incapacitated for active service and that his incapacity is the result of an incident of service, and such decision is approved by the President, said officer shall be retired from active service and placed on the list of retired officers."

A brief statement relative to the military service of the beneficiary follows: Born in Illinois, May 14, 1891; served as a private and corporal, Coast Artillery Corps, from January 5, 1914, to November 28, 1916; accepted appointment as provisional second lieutenant of Infantry, Regular Army, November 29, 1916, with rank from November 26, 1916; was promoted to provisional first lieutenant with rank also from the latter date, and provisional captain, June 4, 1917; and his provisional appointment as captain was made permanent, August 8, 1919. He held an emergency commission as major of Infantry from September 7, 1918, to October 15, 1919, and was transferred to the Quartermaster Corps, Regular Army, July 1, 1920. He was honorably discharged from the service with 1 year's pay, December 26, 1922, under the provisions of the acts of Congress approved June 30 and September 14, 1922, directing a reduction in the commissioned personnel of the Army.

During the World War Captain Jobson was overseas with the American Expeditionary Forces from June 1917 to May 1919 serving with the Eighteenth Infantry, First Division, in the Montdidier-Noyon, Aisne-Marne, St. Mihiel, and Meuse-Argonne operations, and in the Ansauville sector. He was awarded the Purple Heart decoration with one oak-leaf cluster for wounds received in action overseas on May 3, 1918, and October 4, 1918.

The board of general officers convened in compliance with the act of June 30, 1922, to accomplish the prescribed reduction, after thoroughly reviewing the entire record of Captain Jobson, recommended that he be eliminated from the active list because of "relative efficiency ratings; usefulness and relative value to service."

Upon receiving notice of his selection for elimination, Captain Jobson requested to be ordered before a retiring board because of alleged physical disabilities. He stated that he was wounded in action in May 1918 by an exploding shell and suffered a severe concussion and minor wounds on neck; also, that in October 1918 he was again wounded by being gassed with phosgene, his eyes and lungs being affected. He was thereupon examined by a board of medical officers at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., on November 21, 1922, which board concluded that he was not fit for active field duty on account of various neurasthenic manifestations and that this condition was incident to the service and in line of duty. The board also recommended that he be brought before a retiring board.

All reports and records in the case were then reviewed by the Surgeon General, who recommended that Captain Jobson be not ordered before a retiring board, expressing the opinion that the nervous disorder from which the officer was suffering was due to a constitutional psychopathic state which was a part of his physical make-up before entrance into the service. Acting on this recommendation, the War Department disapproved his request to appear before a retiring board and he was discharged from the Army.

On December 29, 1922, 3 days after his separation from the service, Captain Jobson was again examined by one of the medical officers who was a member of the disposition board before which he previously appeared at Fort Sam Houston, and that officer reported that he was physically and mentally sound with the following exceptions:

"1. Psychosis neurasthenia, manifested by headaches, dizziness, shortness of breath, defective memory, mental and physical fatigability, emotional instability, as evidenced by periods of depression irritability; further manifested by unwillingness to accept responsibility, impairment of sexual powers, and inconstant changes in protopathic sensibility.

"2. Functional cardiac disorder, extrasystole."

That medical examiner further expressed the opinion that such disability originated in line of duty in the military service and that the officer was, in view of occupation, 50-percent disabled.

The records further show that on his annual physical examination in January 1922 and again when he was examined for promotion in March 1922 he was found physically qualified for full military duty and no evidence of any disease of the nervous system was present.

The War Department is consistently opposed to special legislation of this type, which would single out an individual for preferential treatment when others in the same category are not accorded equal consideration. The beneficiary of H. R. 5558 was separated from the service in 1922 in accordance with the method prescribed by law, and the matter of his physical condition was exhaustively studied by the War Department at that time. The enactment of this bill would establish an undesirable and embarrassing precedent, which would open the way for the presentation of numerous similar requests for special consideration.

It is the opinion of the War Department that the United States Veterans' Administration is the appropriate governmental agency to extend such relief as the circumstances in this case may warrant. In this connection it is understood that former Captain Jobson is receiving compensation amounting to $40 per month from that Bureau.

If placed on the retired list as a captain under the provisions of H. R. 5558, the beneficiary thereof would receive retired pay at the rate of $1,650 per annum.

For the reasons stated in the foregoing, the War Department is opposed to the enactment of this legislation.

A statement of the medical history of the beneficiary is enclosed.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY H. WOODRING,
Acting Secretary of War.

The medical records show former Capt. Clarence F. Jobson, Quartermaster Corps, treated as follows:

RUDOLPH W. SCHROEDER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3320) to authorize the President to present the Distinguished Flying Cross to Rudolph W. Schroeder, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That the President is hereby authorized to cause the recommendation for the award of a decoration to Rudolph W. Schroeder, a pioneer whose career in American aeronautics began in May 1910; who, while in the Army and later in commercial aviation, by his untiring effort and ingenuity has made and has assisted in making valuable contributions to the development of aircraft and air navigation; and who, as a member of the United States Army Air Service, intrepidly did on February 27, 1920, while piloting a Le Pere airplane, establish a world altitude record, in the course of which flight the primitive oxygen equipment then available failed, causing Rudolph W. Schroeder to lose consciousness, from which he recovered and righted his plane at an altitude of 1,500 feet, having fallen more than 30,000 feet, and who in the same flight, after having climbed to an extreme height, a rise in temperature was experienced, thus penetrating the stratosphere for the first time by man, to be considered by the proper boards or authorities, and such award made to said Schroeder as his said conduct merits.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Illinois to explain this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is an unfavorable report from the Department.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the bill has been amended so as merely to permit the question of some form of decoration for this man to be considered by the proper authorities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the award of a decoration for distinguished service to Rudolph W. Schroeder, who served with the Air Corps, United States Army, during the period of the World War, and who was honorably discharged on November 15, 1920."

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE, KANSAS

The bill (S. 3434) to provide for the appointment of one additional judge for the district of Kansas was announced as next in order.

Mr. CAPPER. Let that go over.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, in connection with this bill, evidently we cannot have it considered during the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar, and I wish to state that I have discussed the matter with the majority leader, and I think that what I am about to say will be agreeable to him. I shall ask for recognition at the conclusion of the call of the calendar for the purpose of making a motion for the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

HENRY IRVING RILEY

The bill (H. R. 5475) for the relief of Henry Irving Riley was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WALTER ACKER, JR.

The bill (S. 2782) for the relief of Walter Acker, Jr., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws or any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Army Walter Acker, Jr., shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged as a first lieutenant, Field Artillery, United States Army, on April 9, 1919: Provided, That no compensation, retirement pay, back pay, pension, or other benefit shall be held to have accrued by reason of this act prior to its passage.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, calling attention to order of business 1429, Senate bill 2782, I find that there is an adverse recommendation from the Department on this bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to consider Walter Acker, Jr., to have been honorably discharged from the Army on April 9, 1919. He was dismissed as an officer on this latter date, having been found guilty by a general court martial for violation of the ninety-fifth article of war, involving improper conduct in a public place and signing and denying that he had signed a certain petition circulated among American officers by the owners of a certain cafe. Acker had had three periods of honorable service prior to this fourth period. On his previous honorable discharges his character was recorded as very good, and excellent. Your committee has reported this bill favorably for the following reasons, which arise as result of a careful study of the court-martial record in Acker's case: Of the three specifications on which he was tried, the court martial itself did not find him guilty on specification 2, and the reviewing authority disapproved the finding of guilt on specification 1. The only remaining specification, the third, alleged that Acker signed a certain petition and that he denied he signed it. The petition was nothing more than one circulated by the owners of a French cafe, requesting permission of the French authorities to permit the cafe to remain open on Thanksgiving night. Acker stated at the trial that he did not sign this petition, that he knew nothing of it at the time, that his name had been forged to it. However, his earnestness in the matter and the inconsequential nature of the petition are demonstrated by the fact that he testified at the time of his trial that had he known of the petition he would have signed it because he did not see anything out of the way in signing it. There was certainly nothing subversive about the petition, inasmuch as it was merely a request to be presented to French officials for permission to the cafe owners to remain open on a Thanksgiving night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the next bill on the calendar.

BATTERY D, ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-SEVENTH COAST ARTILLERY, NEW HAMPSHIRE NATIONAL GUARD

H., they were enlisted in violation of paragraph 3b (6) of National Guard Regulations 25 as then promulgated.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Robert E. Callen, of Greenville, Pa., the sum of $1,000. Said sum shall be in full settlement of all claims against the United States on account of damages sustained by the said Robert E. Callen, of Greenville, Pa., when he was injured by a United States mail truck in Greenville, Pa., on January 20, 1933: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGES, NEBRASKA AND IOWA

The bill (S. 2881) creating the Decatur-Onawa Bridge Board of Trustees and authorizing said board and its successors and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Missouri River between the towns of Decatur, Nebr., and Onawa, Iowa, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] that this bill was included in the omnibus bridge bill passed yesterday.

Mr. BURKE. My understanding is that it was not included.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, can the Chair inform the Senator from Maryland whether or not an omnibus claims bill is to come from the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will it go on the Private Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Claims unless by unanimous consent it is sent to the calendar.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] is correct in his statement regarding this bill. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That in order to promote interstate commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, the county of Burt, State of Nebraska, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River, at a point, suitable to the interests of navigation, between the towns of Decatur, Nebr., and Onawa, Iowa, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the county of Burt, State of Nebraska, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, maintenance, and operation of such bridge and its approaches, as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the cost of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 5. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rates of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. PREFERENTIAL CLAIMS OF UNITED STATES IN BANKRUPTCY CASES

The bill (H. R. 7858) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] make an explanation of the bill?

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, under section 77B of the Bankruptcy Act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept or reject corporation reorganization plans in which the United States is interested. It was assumed when that act was passed that the United States Government would have preferential treatment in its claims for taxes, customs duties, and so forth, but the courts have held otherwise. So, at the request of the Treasury Department, identical bills were introduced in the House and the Senate to make that point clear.

The Senate passed the bill just as introduced, after a unanimous report from the Judiciary Committee; but in the House the measure was passed with certain amendments, and that is the bill we are considering now. However, an agreement has been reached with Chairman Sumners, of the House Judiciary Committee, that if we shall pass the House bill, with an amendment here submitted, they will agree to it.

There are only three provisions involved in the amendment. As the bill passed the House, it would give preferential treatment to the Treasury in corporate reorganizations only as to taxes. The Senate amendment adds also customs duties. The House bill, as passed, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury must act within 60 days in all these cases; and the Senate committee desired to enlarge that to 90 days. The third provision constitutes the Secretary of the Treasury the agent of the United States to act in other matters than in the case of corporations in which the United States may have a controlling interest, but does not afford the same preferential treatment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the amendment does give the Treasury a preference in the matter of taxes?

Mr. BURKE. It provides that no corporate reorganization may be agreed to, in which the Treasury has a claim for taxes, without the consent of the Treasury, unless the Secretary of the Treasury fails to express his consent or dissent within 90 days.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator say that the House committee and the Senate committee are virtually agreed on the bill with the amendment?

Mr. BURKE. They are entirely agreed on the House bill with the amendment that is now proposed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Where the claim of the Government for taxes would absolutely prevent a reorganization, does the Senator still think it would be wise to have that claim preferred?

Mr. BURKE. No, I do not; but I think some agent of the Government should have the right to say whether or not that condition exists, and that is all this bill does. It does not prevent the reorganization, but merely requires the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury if the Government has claim for taxes.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, does this bill affect only claims of the Treasury Department?

Mr. BURKE. As the bill passed the House, it affects only taxes. The Senate committee has added customs duties. It is not clear whether or not they would come within the definition of taxes. Nothing else is affected by the bill as passed by the House.

Mr. GERRY. The Senate committee has made no further amendment?

Mr. BURKE. No; merely to add customs duties.

Mr. GERRY. And that prevents a reorganization until the taxes have been paid?

Mr. BURKE. Yes; or until the Secretary of the Treasury has agreed, on behalf of the Government, to accept a percentage, or to waive the claim altogether. The reorganization may not be put through, if the United States has a claim for taxes or customs duties, without the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is a very desirable bill, and the Treasury is very anxious to have it passed; and the Judiciary Committees of the Senate and of the House, after hearings, are unanimously in favor of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7858) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 3, line 11, after the word "filed", to strike out "If the United States of America is a creditor on claims for taxes, the claims thereof shall be deemed to be affected by the plan, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept a plan in respect of such claims; and no plan which does not provide for the payment thereof shall be confirmed by the judge except upon the acceptance of a lesser amount by the Secretary of the Treasury certified to the court: Provided, That, if the Secretary of the Treasury shall fail to accept or reject a plain for more than 60 days after written notice so to do his consent shall be conclusively presumed" and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

If the United States of America is a creditor or stockholder, the interests or claims thereof shall be deemed to be affected by the plan, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept or reject a plan in respect of the interests or claims of the United States. If, in any reorganization proceeding under this section, the United States is a creditor on claims for taxes or customs duties (whether or not the United States has any other interest in, or claim against, the debtor, as creditor or stockholder), no plan which does not provide for the payment thereof shall be confirmed by the judge except upon the acceptance of a lesser amount by the Secretary of the Treasury certified to the court: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Treasury shall fail to accept or reject a plan for more than 90 days after receipt of written notice so to do from the court to which the plan has been proposed, accompanied by a certified copy of the plan, his consent shall be conclusively presumed.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (1) of subsection (e) of section 77B of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", as amended, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"(e) (1) A plan of reorganization shall not be confirmed until it has been accepted in writing, whether before or after the filing of the petition or answer under this section, and such acceptance shall have been filed in the proceeding by or on behalf of creditors holding two-thirds in amount of the claims of each class whose claims have been allowed and would be affected by the plan and by or on behalf of stockholders of the debtor holding a majority of the stock of each class: Provided, however, That such acceptance shall not be requisite to the confirmation of the plan by any creditor or class of creditors (a) whose claims are not affected by the plan, or (b) if the plan makes provision for the payment of their claims in cash in full, or (c) if provision is made in the plan for the protection of the interests, claims, or liens of such creditor or class of creditors in the manner provided in subdivision (b), clause (5), of this section: And provided further, That such acceptance shall not be requisite to the confirmation of the plan by any stockholder or class of stockholders (1) if the judge shall have determined either that the debtor is insolvent or that the interests of such stockholder or stockholders will not be affected by the plan, or (2) if provision is made in the plan for the protection of the interests of such stockholder or class of stockholders in the manner provided in subdivision (b), clause (4), of this section. With such acceptance there shall be set forth, verified in such manner as the judge shall require, what, if any, contracts of the debtor are executory in whole or in part, and what unexpired leases have been rejected and surrendered. With such acceptance there shall be filed a statement, verified in such manner as the judge shall require, showing what, if any, claims and shares of stock have been purchased or transferred by those accepting the plan after the commencement or in contemplation of the proceeding, and the circumstances of such purchase or transfer: Provided, however, That if the judge is satisfied that by reason of the number of securities outstanding and the extent of the public dealing therein the preparation of such a statement would be impractical, he may direct that it be not filed. If the United States of America is a creditor or stockholder, the interests or claims thereof shall be deemed to be affected by the plan, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept or reject a plan in respect of the interests or claims of the United States. If, in any reorganization proceeding under this section, the United States is a creditor on claims for taxes or customs duties (whether or not the United States has any other interest in, or claim against, the debtor, as creditor or stockholder), no plan which does not provide for the payment thereof shall be confirmed by the judge except upon the acceptance of a lesser amount by the Secretary of the Treasury certified to the court: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Treasury shall fail to accept or reject a plan for more than 90 days after receipt of written notice so to do from the court to which the plan has been proposed, accompanied by a certified copy of the plan, his consent shall be conclusively presumed."

EVERGLADES NATIONAL PARK, FLA.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3197) to repeal a provision of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of the Everglades National Park in the State of Florida, and for other purposes", approved May 30, 1934, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] explain the bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to have the committee amendment disagreed to. The original act establishing the park provided that nothing was to be spent upon it for 5 years, upon the representation that it would require that length of time to acquire title. It is now found that title can be acquired to most of it immediately. A good deal of it was owned by the State of Florida and that State has authorized its conveyance to the Federal Government.

I have asked a repeal of the original provision in the act because such a provision is not contained in any act relating to parks anywhere in the country. It was inserted in the original act upon the misinformation that it would require 5 years to acquire title to the land. I have simply asked to repeal the provision. The department has in its report a recommendation that the bill receive favorable consideration.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, in behalf of the committee I desire to make a statement and then the Senate may decide whether the amendment should be rejected or adopted.

Originally, when the act was passed providing for the Everglades park, Congress inserted a provision that no expenditures should be made by the Federal Government for a period of 5 years, the idea being that the lands would be collected first and donations made, and that a 5-year period should pass before any Federal expenditures should be made. The bill as originally introduced absolutely repealed that provision so expenditures might be made at once.

In a communication to the committee it was stated that the reason why the Director of the Budget did not oppose the repeal of that provision was because it was contemplated to make no expenditures, outside of the expenditure for the establishment of a civilian conservation camp, and so the committee amended the bill to limit it to expenditures for the erection of civilian conservation camps. That is the purpose of the amendment. The Senator from Florida prefers the repeal of the entire provision.

Mr. FLETCHER. No such provision is contained in any act relating to any national park in the country. It was upon the representation that it would take 5 years to acquire title, which was not correct, that the provision was inserted. I am simply asking that that unusual and extraordinary provision be stricken out.

Mr. WAGNER. May I ask the Senator whether any other expenditures will be made?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think so.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course we are changing the policy adopted last year when we enacted the law providing for the establishment of the Everglades park. I have no personal interest in it. I am the last man in the world to want to object to anything the Senator asks, because of my respect and affection for him.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am very glad to have the Senator speak that way. I had a letter from those in charge of the matter in Florida and they say that if the situation is not corrected as I have requested, there will be a discrimination against this park, because no such provision has been inserted in any other act relating to public parks.

I ask that the committee amendment be disagreed to and the bill passed as originally introduced.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, we are all very much interested in the national park system. I should like to have the amendments stated by the clerk in order to see just what effect they have upon the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The Chief Clerk stated the amendments, which were, on page 1, line 3, after the word "That", to insert "notwithstanding"; in the same line, after the word "the", to strike out "following provision" and insert "provisions"; in line 6, after "1934", to strike out "be, and the same is hereby repealed: 'And provided further, That the United States shall not expend any public moneys for the administration, protection, or development of the aforesaid park within a period of 5 years from the date of approval of this act'" and insert "Civilian Conservation Corps camps may be established and maintained in such Everglades National Park for the purpose of developing such park", so as to make the bill read:

INTERFERENCE WITH PEACEFUL PICKETING

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2039) making it a felony to transport in interstate or foreign commerce persons to be employed to obstruct or interfere with the right of peaceful picketing during labor controversies.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what is that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not yet understand the object of the bill.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the object of the bill is to bring within the law the few national agencies which employ armies of men for the purpose of sending them into various States of the Union to interfere in labor controversies through obstructing and interfering physically with those who are engaged in peaceful picketing.

There are four or five such agencies. The only effect of the action of the agencies in sending these gunmen, as I call them and as they are properly described, is to cause disorder, instead of preserving order. The States of the Union have laws to protect citizens and preserve order, and officers to enforce the laws. If they ever fail, the chief executives of the States have the right to call out the National Guard to preserve order. They do not fail to exercise that power in proper cases.

Whenever these national agencies—there are but a few of them—have sent their hirelings into the coal mines or into other industrial centers, the result has invariably been to cause bloodshed, and the use of weapons, and physical violence. It is solely where a person goes with the intent—because that is the language of the bill—to interfere with individuals of a State in the performance of a lawful activity that one is brought within the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, suppose there is a strike—I am speaking now from experience—and the company at whose plant the strike is taking place desires to bring men into the State to take the place of men who are on strike?

Mr. BYRNES. It would not be affected by this bill at all. The bill applies only to cases where it is proved that persons are imported for the purpose of interfering with and obstructing individuals engaged in peaceful picketing, as defined by the courts. Under no circumstances would the bill apply to the case the Senator has suggested.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Are the activities of the Baldwin-Felts Detective Agency some years ago in West Virginia and Colorado, as disclosed by the investigation in which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] at one time officially participated, illustrations of the sort of interference to which the able Senator refers?

Mr. BYRNES. I was a member of the committee appointed by the House to investigate the so-called "Colorado strike", when the Ludlow disaster occurred; and the question of the Senator from Colorado well illustrates the purpose

I have in mind at this time, because the Baldwin-Felts people and the Burgdoff agency have brought about more trouble and more disorder and caused more bloodshed in industrial conflicts than any other agency of which I know. In the instance referred to by the Senator they were responsible for my action in introducing the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would this cover the case which recently occurred in the Senator's own State, where persons came from New York, not to interfere with picketing, but to support the picketers, contending that the employers had not treated them fairly, and they came down to help organize the workers? Would it tend to prevent persons who in good faith go from one State into the Senator's State, or into my State, or into any other State where there is a strike?

Mr. BYRNES. It would not.

Mr. KING. Would it cover a case where persons, believing that the employees were not being properly treated by the employers, went there to give them succor or advice?

Mr. BYRNES. It has absolutely no application to any such case.

Mr. KING. While, undoubtedly, there have been some communists who have gone into States where strikes were in progress for the purpose of encouraging lawlessness, nevertheless, I feel that persons ought to have the opportunity in good faith to go and give succor and advice.

Mr. BYRNES. I share the Senator's view, and I assure him the bill would have absolutely no application to such a case.

Mr. KING. Would it reach a case which, as I understand, was indicated by the Senator from Idaho, where a number of persons paid their own way and went into a place where there was a strike, passed the picket line, and found employment?

Mr. BYRNES. No; the measure specifically provides that they shall go solely with the intent of obstructing and interfering with those engaged in a lawful undertaking.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think on reading the bill that the construction which the able Senator places upon it is entirely correct. It is very limited. It reads:

That whoever shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported, or aid or abet in transporting, in interstate or foreign commerce, any person with intent to employ such person to obstruct or interfere in any manner with the right of peaceful picketing.

And so forth.

Mr. BYRNES. That is the language of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Arkansas, it is now a little after 5 o'clock, and it is desired that we may have an executive session. May we not conclude the call of the calendar now and complete it in the morning?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senate has practically disposed of the legislation which it was expected would be taken up during this session, and there will be a number of other House bills which may come over this evening or in the morning. With that in mind, I am disposed to respond to the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I say to my able friends, that I cannot allow the work of this session to be concluded without calling attention to the fact that I am under obligation to try to have considered the bill to which I have heretofore referred, and I desire to make a motion to have it taken up and disposed of today at the conclusion of the call of the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON. I may say to the Senator from Illinois frankly that I have no objection whatever to the motion he wishes to make, but, as he knows, a large number of Senators will contest that motion.

Mr. LEWIS. As a test of that, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2665, to change the name of the Department of the Interior and to coordinate certain governmental functions.

Mr. BORAH. Regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the calling of the calendar, and the clerk will call the next bill on the calendar.

Be it enacted, etc., That no vessel, regardless of size or rig, excepting public vessels of the United States, shall transport on the navigable waters of the United States from point to point in the continental United States, any inflammable, explosive, or like dangerous cargo, or anchor in such waters while having on board such dangerous cargo, until such vessel has been inspected by the board of local inspectors to determine that such cargo may be carried on such vessel with safety, and a permit issued to her for the presence on board of such cargo, which permit shall be framed under glass and posted in a conspicuous part of the vessel.

The Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to promulgate rules and regulations concerning construction, the appliances and apparatus for stowage, of vessels used in the transportation of inflammable, explosive, or like dangerous cargo on said vessels in order to preserve life and property while in operation or at anchor. The local board of inspectors shall not issue a permit to any vessel until it finds that said vessel is in substantial compliance with the rules and regulations promulgated by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That this act shall not apply to a vessel covered by an unexpired certificate of inspection duly issued in accordance with law by the local inspectors of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation or, if a foreign vessel, by an unexpired certificate of inspection issued under the authority of its own government and recognized under law or treaty by the Government of the United States.

SEC. 2. A penalty of not to exceed $500 may be imposed for each violation of any of the provisions of this act or of any of the rules and regulations promulgated under the authority of this act. The vessel shall be liable for the said penalty and may be seized and proceeded against, by way of libel, in the district court of the United States for any district within which such vessel may be found.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the bill provides that when inflammables, dynamite, and things like that, are taken on a ship, there must be an inspection.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this bill is designed to permit the Department of Commerce to sell any small vessels they have which may be suitable in the northwest for fishing purposes. It is recommended by the Department as a proper bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The next amendment was, on page 6, to strike out section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. Nothing in this act shall be held to deprive the State of Ohio, or any political subdivision thereof, of its civil and criminal jurisdiction in and over the area included in such national monument nor shall this act in any way impair or affect the rights of citizenship of any resident therein; and, save and except as the consent of the State of Ohio may be hereafter given, the legislative authority of said State in and over all areas included in such national monument shall not be diminished or affected by the creation of such national monument nor by any terms or provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 12, to renumber section 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the call of the calendar.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR DISTRICT OF KANSAS

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3434, being Calendar No. 1427, to provide for the appointment of one additional judge for the district of Kansas.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I should like to have time to discuss that measure, because I regret to differ with my colleague on the merits of the bill. I should like to have at least a half hour in which to present objections to the passage of the bill. It is of very great importance to the State of Kansas.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, may we have a vote on the motion to take up the bill? Then I shall be willing to conform to the wishes of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest that the Senate vote on the motion to take up the bill. A number of Senators wish to submit some unanimous-consent requests. The consideration of the bill might go over until tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] is not prepared to go forward at this time, and that he would rather have the matter presented tomorrow.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. Let the motion be the pending business. I think we had better take a vote on the motion.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Kansas, I understand, is not prepared to have that done.

Mr. McGILL. I am not going to urge that we proceed with the bill tonight. I am perfectly willing to allow the Senate to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily; but I should like to have the motion voted upon, so that we might have the bill before us.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL] having made a motion to proceed to the consideration of this bill, if no other business should be transacted except that which is done by unanimous consent, and the Senate should take a recess, then, as I understand, the motion would be the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; the motion would be the unfinished business tomorrow.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I suggest that Senators submit their requests.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL].

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the unfinished business, the motion, be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to renew my motion for the consideration of Senate bill 2665.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] asks unanimous consent that the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL] be considered the unfinished business when the Senate convenes tomorrow.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McGILL. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McGILL. Has the motion made by myself been made the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been made the unfinished business for tomorrow when the Senate convenes.

LIMITATION OF SHIPOWNERS' LIABILITY

Mr. COPELAND. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, with amendments, Senate bill 3446, relative to limitation of shipowners' liability, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LEWIS. I may say that I preceded the Senator from New York with my motion. I do not wish to interrupt his statement, but I moved to have considered Calendar No. 1204, Senate bill 2665, and until that motion shall have been disposed of I am sure my able friend of New York will not insist on intruding upon me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair knows of no motion pending at the present time. The only question pending at the present time is the request for unanimous consent by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. McNARY. What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] will state it again.

Mr. COPELAND. There has been pending here since January a bill to provide for limitation of liability of shipowners. In connection with the Morro Castle disaster, where 124 persons lost their lives, it was found that under the laws as they exist, only the salvage value of the ship could be used to reimburse the losses incurred by reason of the accident. Under the British law, provision is made for insurance, fixed at £15 per gross ton, to cover both property and life.

The bill I seek to bring up, which has been considered in the House and which was unanimously reported by the Commerce Committee yesterday, provides that an insurance of $60 per gross ton of the vessel must be carried, which in the case of the Morro Castle would have meant about $1,000,000 insurance, whereas the salvage value now is only $20,000. The bill seeks to give protection such as ought to have been afforded long ago.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator is the insurance to be used as a fund to pay claims against vessels?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think such a provision is very necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York to proceed to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 6, after the word "the" where it occurs the second time, to insert "total"; in line 8, after the word "vessel" and the comma, to insert "whether American or foreign,"; in line 9, after the word "tenders" and the comma, to strike out "whether American or foreign,"; in line 10, before the word "loss", to strike out "any" and insert "the entire"; in the same line, after the word "personal", to strike out "injury" and insert "injuries"; and in line 11, after the word "shall", to strike out "not exceed an aggregate amount of $50 for each ton of such vessel's tonnage," and insert "be in an amount not less than an amount equal to $60 for each ton of the tonnage of such vessel or vessels", so as to make the section read:

LIMITATION OF SHIPOWNERS' LIABILITY

SECTION 1. Revised Statutes 4283, United States Code, title 46, section 183, shall be amended by adding the following proviso at the end thereof: "Provided, That the total liability of the owner or owners of any sea-going sailing, steam, or motor vessel, whether American or foreign, other than tugs, barges, fishing vessels and their tenders, for the entire loss of life or personal injuries caused without the fault or privity of such owner or owners to any person, shall be in an amount not less than an amount equal to $60 for each ton of the tonnage of such vessel or vessels, or the amount or value of the interest of such owner in such vessel and her freight then pending, if the latter be the greater amount. The tonnage of a steam or motor vessel shall be her gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine room, and the tonnage of a sailing vessel shall be her registered tonnage, provided that there shall not be included in such tonnage any space occupied by seamen or apprentices and appropriated to their use. The owner of every sea-going vessel or share therein shall be liable in respect of every such loss of life or personal injury arising on distinct occasions to the same extent as if no other loss or injury had arisen."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 13, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. In respect of loss of life or bodily injury, the actual privity or knowledge of the master of a sea-going vessel (other than tugs, barges, fishing vessels, and their tenders), or of the superintendent or managing agent of the owner thereof, at or prior to the commencement of each voyage, shall be deemed conclusively the privity or knowledge of the owner of such vessel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 13, after the amendment heretofore agreed to, to insert:

SEC. 3. Chapter 6 of title 48 of the Revised Statutes is amended by inserting after section 4283, as amended, the following new section:

"SEC. 4283A. Stipulations limiting time for filing claims and commencing suit: (a) It shall be unlawful for the manager, agent, master, or owner of any sea-going vessel (other than tugs, barges, fishing vessels, and their tenders) transporting passengers or merchandise or property from or between ports of the United States and foreign ports to provide by rule, contract, regulation, or otherwise a shorter period for giving notice of, or filing claims for loss of life or bodily injury, than 6 months, and for the institution of suits on such claims, than 1 year, such period for institution of suits to be computed from the day when the death or injury occurred.

"(b) Failure to give such notice, where lawfully prescribed in such contract, shall not bar any such claim—

"(1) If the owner or master of the vessel or his agent had knowledge of the injury, damage, or loss and the court determines that the owner has not been prejudiced by the failure to give such notice; nor

"(2) If the court excuses such failure on the ground that for some satisfactory reason such notice could not be given; nor

"(3) Unless objection to such failure is raised by the owner.

"(c) If a person who is entitled to recover on any such claim is mentally incompetent or a minor, or if the action is one for wrongful death, any lawful limitation of time prescribed in such contract shall not be applicable so long as no legal representative has been appointed for such incompetent, minor, or decedent's estate, but shall be applicable from the date of the appointment of such legal representative: Provided, however, That such appointment be made within 3 years after the date of such death or injury."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMEMORATION OF ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTH OF DANIEL BOONE

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 7678.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 7678) to authorize the Director of the Mint to supplement the approved design of the 50-cent piece commemorating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Daniel Boone, the coinage of which was authorized by act of the Seventy-third Congress (Public, No. 258, S. 3355), which was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARRESTS IN CIVIL SUITS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 2524, amending section 112 of the United States Code, Annotated—title 28; subtitle "Civil Suits; where to be brought", be taken up and put on its passage. This bill has been thoroughly considered by the Judiciary Committee and favorably reported. The Senator who objected to it has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the number of the bill on the calendar?

Mr. TYDINGS. It is Calendar No. 891.

Mr. ROBINSON. What, may I ask, is the general purpose of the bill? What changes does it make in the law?

Mr. TYDINGS. Where suits are brought in the State courts by minority stockholders, charging fraud, the courts do not have jurisdiction sufficient to enable the parties to obtain the books with which to substantiate their charges; and when the suits are brought in the Federal courts, the same thing applies. The bill is simply designed in the interest of minority stockholders, where large mergers occur, so that they may get the books of the corporation, and, if there has been fraud, prove the fraud in the particular accusation.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] has objected to the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I think I can explain that. The Senator from Pennsylvania is interested in an amendment similar to the one which I hold in my hand and which I, myself, intend to offer, and which I understand the Senator from Maryland is willing to accept.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I may say to the Senate before the amendment is read that the bill was completely discussed before the entire Judiciary Committee, and briefs were filed, showing numerous cases where stockholders were defrauded, because they were prevented from having a day in court. They could not get jurisdiction of the books. It is only because, unless something is done, this will happen again in the future that I ask for passage of the bill at this hour of the session.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, is it a bill for the protection of the minority stockholders?

Mr. TYDINGS. It is.

Mr. JOHNSON. May we have the amendment stated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 2, line 10, at the end of the bill, to insert the words "but this proviso shall only apply where all the parties joined as defendants are indispensable parties."

Mr. TYDINGS. In other words, the Senator from Pennsylvania would like to have the complainants assert that the people to be summoned are absolutely indispensable, so that people may not be brought into court who are dispensable. I would rather have the bill without the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator does not want it, why accept it?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am afraid someone would object, and I would not get any bill at all.

Mr. BARBOUR. The Senator is perfectly correct in that statement.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from New Jersey says the Senator is perfectly correct in that statement. I am not against the amendment, but I am opposed to the method of legislation which says, when an amendment is presented, "You will not have a bill if you do not adopt my amendment." I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. BARBOUR. The Senator from Pennsylvania is interested in the amount and would object, were he present, unless it were agreed to. I do not see, under the circumstances, how I can do otherwise than make objection, and I do that now. I am reluctant to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is heard.

DISTRIBUTION OF TERRITORIAL PAPERS

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the Secretary of State has prepared a bill to provide for Federal distribution of the papers of the Territories which are published by the Department of State. It reduces the number and thereby saves expense and makes the distribution to educational institutions in the State designated by the Governor. The Secretary of State is anxious to have the bill passed. From the Committee on Printing, I report the bill favorably and submit a report (No. 1447) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3447) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the collection and editing of official papers of the Territories of the United States now in the National Archives", approved March 3, 1925, as amended, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the collection and editing of official papers of the Territories of the United States now in The National Archives", approved March 3, 1925, as amended by the act approved February 28, 1929 (U. S. C., Supp. 7, title V, sec. 168a), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"168a. The Public Printer shall print, bind, and deliver to the Superintendent of Documents, for distribution as may be directed by the Secretary of State, 1,227 copies of each volume of the Official Papers Relating to the Territories of the United States, of which not to exceed 3 copies shall be furnished to the Vice President and each Senator and 1 copy to each Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner; 4 copies to the library of the Department of the Interior; and 1 copy of each volume to those historical associations, commissions, museums, or libraries and other nondepository libraries, which shall not exceed eight in number within each State, Territory, or insular possession, and which have been or hereafter may be designated by the Governor thereof to the Secretary of State of the United States, and the residue of the said 1,227 copies shall be for the Department of State for such use as the Secretary of State may deem appropriate.

"168b. In addition to the foregoing there shall be furnished to the Superintendent of Documents a sufficient number of copies of each volume for distribution to such depository libraries as may make written application therefor; and

To the Library of Congress for international exchange and for official use in Washington, D. C., not to exceed 150 copies.

The "usual number" shall not be printed.

"168c. The historical associations, commissions, museums, or libraries and other nondepository libraries within each State, Territory, or insular possession which have been or hereafter may be designated by the Governor thereof to receive these publications shall, during their existence, receive the succeeding volumes, the distribution of which shall be made by the Superintendent of Documents in accordance with the lists of designations transmitted to him by the Secretary of State, and a new designation may be made by the Governor only when a designated association, commission, museum, or library shall cease to exist or other designation may be authorized by law.

"168d. For defraying the expenses to be incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act, including the employment, either in or outside of the District of Columbia, of not to exceed five historical experts, especially informed on the various phases of the territorial history of the United States, without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and the civil-service rules, and for all other purposes, including salaries for personnel, printing and binding, contingent expenses and traveling expenses, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not more than the sum of $125,000, and under this authorization not more than $50,000 shall be appropriated for any one year."

ACTIVE DUTY FOR RESERVE OFFICERS

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], who objected to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6250) to amend the National Defense Act, has withdrawn his objection. Accordingly I ask unanimous consent to recur to it and to have it considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to call annually, with their consent, upon application to and selection by the War Department, for a period of not more than 1 year for any one officer, not to exceed at any time 1,000 Reserve officers of the combatant arms and the Chemical Warfare Service in the grade of second lieutenant, for active duty with the Regular Army: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall affect the number of Reserve officers that may be called to active duty under existing laws, nor the conditions under and purposes for which they may be so called.

SEC. 2. That, for the period of 10 years beginning July 1, 1936, the Secretary of War is authorized to select annually, in addition to the graduates from the United States Military Academy, 50 officers who shall be commissioned in the Regular Army: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall determine for each annual increment the number to be allotted among the promotion list branches: And provided further, That the number to be appointed in the promotion list branches shall be selected from such Reserve officers who have received the training herein authorized or from graduates of the Army Air Corps Training Center.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Texas desire action on the bill at this time?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. What is the bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is a House bill carrying no appropriation. It authorizes a certain number of R. O. T. C. or C. M. T. C. graduates to take a year's training each year as second lieutenants with the Army, no graduate to have training for more than 1 year. It also authorizes the appointment each year as second lieutenants, Regular Army, of not more than 50 from these trainees and from graduates of the Air Corps training center.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think there is no objection to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATOR FOR MONTANA

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I desire to enter objection to the confirmation of Mr. Ray Hart as Works Progress Administrator for Montana. I have received a great number of letters and telegrams from certain labor organizations of Montana objecting to the confirmation of his nomination. It seems that he is regarded as objectionable to labor and that he is not giving proper consideration to labor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, has the nomination been received, referred, considered by a committee, and reported?

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, the nomination has been reported today from the Committee on Finance of Mr. Arthur J. Mellott, of my State of Kansas, to be a member of the Board of Tax Appeals. It has been pending for some time, and there is really no objection to it. I ask unanimous consent that the nomination be considered at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I know the nomination has been pending for quite a while, perhaps a month. I think it appropriate to concur in the request of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. McGILL. No. The nomination was reported today by the Committee on Finance.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, AUGUST 22, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name, who hast set Thy glory above the heavens. Clothed with divine love, patience, and sympathy, Thou hast revealed Thyself in the life and message of the Galilean Teacher. He loved the pure, and yet helped the impure; He loved perfection, and yet was patient with all imperfection; He was master of His appetites, and yet was a friend of the glutton; He was self-denying, and yet was lenient with the self-indulgent. In word and deed, Heavenly Father, send us forth to do likewise—to feel for men, pity the distressed, and care for mankind. Oh, the path of duty walked with Thee is a path of enchantment. In the simple life, with humble labors of love and with its homely happiness, is a never-failing spring of peace and joy; stay our hearts here, O Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LIQUOR TAX ADMINISTRATION BILL

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9185), to insure the collection of the revenue on intoxicating liquor, to provide for the more efficient and economical administration and enforcement of the laws relating to the taxation of intoxicating liquor, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. CELLER. Reserving the right to object.

Mr. TREADWAY. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman to give the House an explanation of the bill with reference particularly to section 403?

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, this bill deals with many phases of internal-revenue taxation. For the most part the bill proposes technical amendments to the existing law on that subject. Many of these amendments have as their object the more economical administration of the laws. Originally there were three bills sent down by the Treasury Department recommending changes in the administration of the internal-revenue laws. They have been combined into this bill and other provisions added. The bill simplifies enforcement of tax laws and avoids duplication in the work of tax collection.

Other provisions of the bill propose the elimination of obsolete requirements of the statutes, some of them running back as far as 1875, which can now be repealed without danger to the revenue.

Other statutes, old and new, are proposed to be modified to remove the burdens on the beer, wine, and spirits producing and distributing industry, where this can be done without sacrificing the efficiency of the execution of the law and the certainty of the collection of the tax. For instance, section 302 permits the Secretary of the Treasury to waive the survey requirements as to whisky and rum distilleries, which is now done in the cases of industrial alcohol and fruit brandy distilleries. The survey is an old method of determining the daily spirit-producing capacity of distilleries which are now required to produce 80 percent of that capacity or pay a deficiency assessment. It is believed that on waiver of survey the output of distilleries, and hence the revenue collected, may be greatly increased with the same equipment. Other sections adjust the bonds of distillers in the event such survey is waived and relieve distillers of such restrictions as to cisterns, and provide for such equipment by way of tanks as the Secretary shall deem necessary to protect the revenue.

Again in the case of brewers the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to permit the use of such modern tapping devices or faucets as may be consistent with the protection of the revenue through the proper fixing and destruction of stamps on beer hogsheads, barrels, and kegs. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to prescribe the penal sums of bonds to be furnished by brewers in proportion to the capacity of the plant but in no event would be less than $1,000. The present law provides that the bonds shall be in a sum equal to three times the amount of the tax, or $15 a barrel of 31 gallons, which it is believed is excessive and imposes an unnecessary hardship as to premiums.

Section 318 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the ameliorization and fortification of wine without supervision by any officer of the United States whenever he determines this may be done without danger to the revenue.

Supervision is deemed unnecessary since wine must be tax paid upon removal from bonded winery premises. This will result in a saving to the Government as will the provisions of waiver of survey in the case of distillers. The manufacture of wine from citrus fruits other than lemons and limes is permitted for the first time, as is the fortification of citrus-fruit brandies. Dates are included as fruits from which brandy can be distilled. The tax on brandy removed by wine makers for fortification of wines and citrus-fruit wines is reduced from 20 cents to 10 cents per proof gallon. This has been more or less of a duplicating tax as the addition of brandy to natural wine brings it about the 14-percent alcohol dividing line and doubles the tax on the wine. In addition, it is provided that the assessment for the taxes so levied shall be paid within 12 months instead of 10 months as at present. This brings the date of payment to a period when the wine is being marketed, and not in the middle of summer or in a vintage period as at present. The tax on grape concentrate, which has been decidedly more of a nuisance tax than a revenue producer, having brought in only $20,000 in the last year, is repealed.

The redemption of strip stamps, issued under the Liquor Taxing Act of 1934, is now provided for. The purpose of this amendment is to remove the incentive to bootleg these stamps which have not hitherto been redeemable.

Tax-free withdrawal of alcohol for the use of clinics operated for charity and not for profit is permitted by an amendment contained in section 329.

An effort to curb systematized smuggling by so-called "travelers" across the borders is provided by section 337, which reduces the amount of liquor, wine, or beer that may be imported free of customs duty to one wine gallon not in excess of $100. The present law has permitted any quantity up to $100 in value.

The bill also closes doors which are now open to the tax evader and is intended to provide closer supervision of those liable for the various taxes under these laws. The committee has also removed some deadwood, and in those sections of the statutes which it has revised it has endeavored to clarify and codify the Internal Revenue laws relating to liquor.

Mr. Speaker, the bill has had a thorough consideration by the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Alcohol, by the Treasury and Internal Revenue experts, by legislative counsel, and finally by the full committee, and is presented to you with a unanimous report that it do pass.

I now merely want to answer the specific question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] with reference to section 403. This imposes an embargo upon the importation or bringing into the United States of any kind of distilled spirits, wines, or fermented malt liquors produced, sold, or marketed by any person against whom there has been instituted—and this word "person" includes corporations—or against whom process has been issued for the institution of, any proceeding by the United States, based on a claim arising out of the customs or internal-revenue laws of the United States, in connection with an alleged bringing into the United States of liquors and of any liquors in which such person has any interest, or of liquors produced or marketed by any plant or business outside of the United States, in which he has a substantial interest, until such person submits to the jurisdictional requirements of the proper court and furnishes security to insure the payment of the claim. During the time the eighteenth amendment was in force about $100,000,000 of claims, duties, and taxes, the Treasury informs me, have accrued against people who have fled from or who have never been in the jurisdiction of the United States, and who now have substantial interest in distilleries or other liquor manufactories in foreign nations, and it is proposed to bring these people within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts by refusing to permit them to import their liquor into the United States until they accept such jurisdiction.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, a bill has been presented to the House by the Committee on the Judiciary seeking to carry out the constitutional pledge in regard to the twenty-first amendment. I have been trying to get that bill considered for 2 or 3 weeks. I do not criticize anybody about it; but I hope that we can have some understanding that at the conclusion of this bill that other bill, which would complete the program, can be taken up.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, I am in thorough accord with the gentleman, and I hope that may be the case.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It does not seem to me it is carrying out the obligation of the Congress to enact these items of legislation contained in the bill now under consideration and leave the constitutional pledge untouched.

Mr. BUCK. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Has the gentleman examined the provisions of his bill and the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary which passed the House a few days ago with reference to the seizure of property? It strikes me there was an inconsistency. I hope the gentleman has it clear in his mind that if we pass this bill there will be no inconsistency.

Mr. BUCK. I think the gentleman refers to S. 3336, which was passed here.

Mr. CELLER. That is correct.

Mr. BUCK. And to section 303 therein. I have examined them. I find that the language in S. 3336 and that in H. R. 9185, section 402, are in no way inconsistent.

Mr. CELLER. And in addition, the gentleman feels that the provisions of this bill relative to the limitation of the amount of liquor that one person may bring into this country duty free is limited to 1 gallon?

Mr. BUCK. That is correct.

Mr. CELLER. There is no question about that?

Mr. BUCK. There is no question about that. We have reduced that to 1 gallon.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the gentleman to say that in addition to favorable unanimous report of the Committee on Ways and Means, this bill has the sanction of the enforcement officers of the United States through the Treasury Department?

Mr. BUCK. That is correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. I have no objection, and I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. BUCK. I sincerely trust that there will be no objection to this bill which is aimed for the benefit both of the industry and the Treasury.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

SECTION 301. (a) Section 3262 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (26 U. S. C., sec. 286; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 26, secs. 1166 (b) and 1353), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3262. (a) No bond of a distiller shall be approved unless—

"(1) The distiller is the owner in fee, unencumbered by any mortgage, judgment, or other lien, of the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated; or

"(2) The distiller files with the officer designated for the purpose by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in connection with his notice, the written consent of the owner of the fee, and of any mortgagee, judgment-creditor, or other person having a lien thereon, duly acknowledged, that the premises may be used for the purpose of distilling spirits, subject to the provisions of law, and expressly stipulating that the lien of the United States for taxes and penalties shall have priority of such mortgage, judgment, or other encumbrance, and that in the case of the forfeiture of the distillery premises, or any part thereof, the title to the same shall vest in the United States, discharged from such mortgage, judgment, or other encumbrance; or, if consent as required under this paragraph cannot be obtained,

"(3) The distiller, with the approval of the Commissioner, files with the officer designated by the Commissioner a bond, approved by the Commissioner, in the penal sum equal to the appraised value of the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated, the distillery, the buildings, and the distilling apparatus. Such value shall be determined, and such bond shall be executed, in such form and with such sureties, and filed with the officer designated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

"(b) In any case where the owner of a distillery or distilling apparatus, erected prior to July 20, 1868, has only an estate for a term of years or other estate less than fee-simple in the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated, the evidence of title to which shall have been duly recorded prior to that date; or in like case, where the lease or other evidence of title is held but was not required by the laws of the State to be recorded in order to be valid at the time of its execution; or in any case of such prior erection where the title was then, and has continued to be, in litigation; or in any case of such prior erection where such owner is possessed of the fee, but encumbered with a mortgage executed and duly recorded prior to July 20, 1868, and not due, or in any case of such prior erection where the fee is held by a femme-covert, minor, person of unsound mind, or other person incapable of giving consent, as required in subsection (a), the value of such lot or tract of land, together with the building and distilling apparatus, shall be appraised in the manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner; and the officer designated by the Commissioner may, at the discretion of the Commissioner, be authorized to accept, in lieu of the said written consent, the bond of such distiller, in such form as the Commissioner may prescribe, with not less than two sureties, conditioned that in case the distillery, distilling apparatus, or any part thereof, shall by final judgment be forfeited for the violation of any of the provisions of law, the obligors shall pay the amount stated in said bond. Said sureties shall be residents of the collection district or county, or of an adjoining county in the same

State in which the distillery is situated, and owners of unencumbered real estate in said district or county, or adjoining county, equal to such appraised value, and the penal sum of said bond shall be equal to the appraised value of said lot or tract of land together with the buildings and distilling apparatus.

"(c) The officer designated by the Commissioner may at any time, at the discretion of the Commissioner, accept such bond as is authorized to be given by the distiller in lieu of the written consent of the owner of the fee in the case of a distillery erected prior to July 20, 1868, notwithstanding such distillery has since then been increased by the addition of land or buildings adjacent or contiguous thereto, not owned by the distiller himself in fee; such bond to be for and in respect of such addition only, if the distillery be one which the distiller owns in fee or in respect to which he has procured the written consent of the owner of the fee or other encumbrance, otherwise to be for and in respect of the entire distillery as increased by such addition.

"(d) In case of any distillery sold at judicial or other sale in favor of the United States a bond may be taken at the discretion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in lieu of the written consent required by this section, and the person giving such bond may be allowed to operate such distillery during the existence of the right of redemption from such sale, on complying with all the other provisions of law.

"(e) No lien shall attach to any lot or tract of land, distillery, building, or distilling apparatus, under the provisions of section 3251 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, by reason of distilling done during any period included within the term of any bond taken under the provisions of paragraph (3) of subsection (a) of this section."

SEC. 302. Section 3264 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (26 U. S. C., sec. 289; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1168), is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"The Secretary of the Treasury in the case of any distillery may, under regulations, waive such of the requirements of this section as he determines may be waived without danger to the revenue. Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury, by authority of this paragraph, waives any or all of the requirements of this section, he may, by regulation, relieve the distiller from such requirements of sections 3285, 3309, 3310, and 3311 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, and of section 6 of the act of March 1, 1879, as amended (26 U. S. C. 321), and of such other provisions of law relating or incidental to survey requirements, as the Secretary determines may be waived without danger to the revenue."

"Whenever, under authority of law, the Secretary of the Treasury shall relieve a distiller from the survey requirements of section 3264 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (26 U. S. C., sec. 289; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1168), he may likewise by regulation fix the penal sum of the distiller's bond, but in no case shall the amount of the minimum bond be less than $5,000, nor the amount of the maximum bond greater than $100,000."

SEC. 304. Section 3267 of the Revised Statutes (26 U. S. C., sec. 292; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1171), is amended by adding a new paragraph at the end thereof, to read as follows:

"Whenever, under authority of law, the Secretary of the Treasury shall relieve a distiller from the survey requirements, he may, by regulation, require the distiller to provide such receiving cisterns, tanks, or such other equipment as the Secretary shall deem proper in order to protect the revenue."

SEC. 305. Section 67 of the act of August 27, 1894 (28 Stat. 568), (26 U. S. C., sec. 287; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1166 (c)), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 67. (a) No individual, firm, partnership, corporation, or association, intending to commence or to continue the business of a distiller, rectifier, brewer, or wine maker, shall commence or continue the business of a distiller, rectifier, brewer, or wine maker until all bonds in respect of such a business, required by any provision of law, have been approved by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or such other officer of the Bureau of Internal Revenue as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may designate.

"(b) The Commissioner or the designated officer may disapprove any such bond or bonds if the individual, firm, partnership, corporation, or association giving the same, or owning, controlling, or actively participating in the management of the business of the individual or firm, partnership, corporation, or association giving the same, shall have been previously convicted, in a court of competent jurisdiction, of (1) any fraudulent noncompliance with any provision of any law of the United States if such provision related to internal-revenue or customs taxation of intoxicating liquor, or if such an offense shall have been compromised with the individual, firm, partnership, corporation, or association upon payment of penalties or otherwise, or (2) any felony under a law of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or the United States, prohibiting the manufacture, sale, importation, or transportation of intoxicating liquor.

"(c) In case the disapproval is by any officer other than the Commissioner, the individual, firm, partnership, corporation, or association giving the bond may appeal from such disapproval to the Commissioner.

"(d) The disapproval of the Commissioner in any matter under this section shall be final."

SEC. 306. Section 2 of the act entitled "An act to allow the bottling of distilled spirits in bond", approved March 3, 1897, as amended (26 U. S. C., sec. 412; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1277), is further amended by striking out the last clause following the words "Secretary of the Treasury" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "but no spirits (except gin for export) shall be bottled in bond until they have remained in bond in wooden containers for at least 4 years from the date of original gage as to fruit brandy, or original entry as to all other spirits."

"(b) The product made from the juice of sound, ripe grapes by complete fermentation of the must under proper cellar treatment and corrected by the addition (under the supervision of a storekeeper-gauger, unless such supervision is dispensed with by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the provisions of section 318 of the Liquor Tax Administration Act) of a solution of water and pure cane, beet, or dextrose sugar (containing, respectively, not less than 95 percent of actual sugar, calculated on a dry basis) to the must or to the wine, to correct natural deficiencies, when such addition shall not increase the volume of the resultant product more than 35 percent, and the resultant product does not contain less than 5 parts per thousand of acid before fermentation and not more than 13 percent of alcohol after complete fermentation, shall be deemed to be wine within the meaning of this act, and may be labeled, transported, and sold as 'wine', qualified by the name of the locality where produced, and may be further qualified by the name of its own particular type or variety.

"(c) Wine as defined in this section may be sweetened with cane sugar or beet sugar or pure condensed grape must and fortified under the provisions of this act, and wines so sweetened or fortified shall be considered sweet wine within the meaning of this act.

"(d) The provisions of the internal-revenue laws applicable to natural wine shall apply in the same manner and to the same extent to citrus-fruit wines which are the product of normal alcoholic fermentation of the juice of sound ripe citrus fruit (except lemons and limes) with or without the addition of dry cane, beet, or dextrose sugar (containing, respectively, not less than 95 percent of actual sugar, calculated on a dry basis) for the purpose of perfecting the product according to standards, but without the addition or abstraction of other substances, except as may occur in the usual cellar treatment of clarifying or aging."

SEC. 331. Section 612 of the Revenue Act of 1918, as amended (26 U. S. C. 443; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1301), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 612. (a) Under such regulations and official supervision and upon the giving of such notices, entries, bonds, and other security as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may prescribe, any producer of wines defined under the provisions of this title may withdraw from any fruit distillery or special bonded warehouse grape brandy, or wine spirits, for the fortification of such wines on the premises where actually made and any producer of citrus-fruit wines may similarly withdraw citrus-fruit brandy for the fortification of citrus-fruit wines on the premises where actually made: Provided, That after the date of the enactment of the Liquor Tax Administration Act there shall be levied and assessed against the producer of such wines or citrus-fruit wines (in lieu of the internal-revenue tax now imposed thereon by law) a tax of 10 cents per proof-gallon of grape brandy, citrus-fruit brandy, or wine spirits, whenever withdrawn and so used by him after such date in the fortification of such wines or citrus-fruit wines during the preceding month, which assessment shall be paid by him within 12 months from the date of notice thereof. When such wines are sold or removed for the manufacture of vinegar, or the production of dealcoholized wines containing less than one-half of 1 percent of alcohol by volume, the tax under this section on such grape brandy, citrus-fruit brandy, or wine spirits shall, under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, be abated or refunded.

"(b) Nothing contained in this section shall be construed as exempting any wines, citrus-fruit wines, cordials, liqueurs, or similar compounds from the payment of any tax provided for in this title.

"(c) Any such wines, or citrus-fruit wines may, under such regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, be sold or removed tax free for the manufacture of vinegar, or for the production of dealcoholized wines containing less than one-half of 1 percent of alcohol by volume.

"(d) The taxes imposed by this section shall not apply to dealcoholized wines containing less than one-half of 1 percent of alcohol by volume."

SEC. 332. Section 42 of the act approved October 1, 1890 (26 U. S. C. 445; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1302 (a)), as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 42. (a) Any producer of pure sweet wines may use in the preparation of such sweet wines, under such regulations and after the filing of such notices and bonds, together with the keeping of such records and the rendition of such reports as to materials and products as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, wine spirits produced by any duly authorized distiller, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in determining the liability of any distiller of wine spirits to assessment under section 3309 of the Revised Statutes, is authorized to allow such distiller credit in his computation for the wine spirits withdrawn to be used in fortifying sweet wines under this act.

"(b) The provisions of this section and section 43 shall apply to the use of citrus-fruit brandy in the preparation of fortified citrus-fruit wines in the same manner and to the same extent as such provisions apply to the use of wine spirits in the fortification of sweet wines, except that no brandy (other than a citrus-fruit brandy) may be used in the fortification of citrus-fruit wine and a citrus-fruit brandy prepared from one kind of citrus fruit may not be used for the fortification of a citrus-fruit wine prepared from another kind of citrus fruit or for the fortification of a wine prepared from any fruit other than citrus fruit."

SEC. 333. Section 3255 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (26 U. S. C. 297; Supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1176), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3255. (a) The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may exempt distillers of brandy made exclusively from apples, peaches, grapes, pears, pineapples, apricots, berries, plums, pawpaws, persimmons, prunes, figs, cherries, dates, or citrus fruits (except lemons and limes) from any provision of the internal-revenue laws relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the tax thereon, when in his judgment it may seem expedient to do so.

"(b) Where, in the manufacture of wine, or citrus-fruit wine, artificial sweetening has been used, the wine, or the fruit pomace residuum thereof, or the citrus-fruit wine may be used in the distillation of brandy, or citrus-fruit brandy, as the case may be, and such use shall not prevent the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, from exempting such distiller from any provision of the internal-revenue laws relating to the manufacture of spirits, except as to the tax thereon, when in his judgment it may seem expedient to do so.

"(c) The distillers mentioned in this section may add to not less than 500 gallons (or 10 barrels) of grape cheese not more than 500 gallons of a sugar solution made from cane, beet, starch, or corn sugar, 95 percent pure, such solution to have a saccharine strength of not to exceed 10 percent, and may ferment the resultant mixture on a winery or distillery premises, and such fermented product shall be regarded as distilling material."

SEC. 334. Section 618 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1918 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, sec. 1304) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, it shall be lawful to produce grape wines and citrus-fruit wines on bonded winery premises by the usual method, and to transport and use the same, and like wines heretofore produced and now stored on bonded winery premises, as distilling material in any fruit-brandy distillery or industrial-alcohol plant. The alcohol removed from such liquid, if evaporated, and not condensed and saved, shall not be subject to tax; if saved, it shall be subject to the same law as other alcoholic liquors. Credit shall be allowed on the tax due on any alcohol or brandy so saved to the amount of any tax paid upon distilled spirits or brandy used in the fortification of the liquor from which the same is saved."

SEC. 335. Section 620 of the Revenue Act of 1918 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, sec. 1309) is amended by striking out the following: "or whoever rectifies, mixes, or compounds with distilled spirits any domestic wines, other than in the manufacture of liqueurs, cordials, or similar compounds,".

SEC. 336. The tax imposed by section 601 (c) (3) of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended (relating to the tax on grape concentrate, etc.), shall not apply to any sale or importation after the date of the enactment of this act.

SEC. 337. The third proviso of section 1798 of the Tariff Act of 1930 is amended to read as follows: "Provided further, That up to but not exceeding $100 in value (including distilled spirits, wines, and malt liquors aggregating not more than 1 wine-gallon) of articles acquired abroad by such residents of the United States for personal or household use or as souvenirs or curios, but not bought on commission or intended for sale, shall be admitted free of duty:".

TITLE IV

SEC. 401. (a) Section 3354 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (26 U. S. C., sec. 525; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 26, sec. 1336), is amended by striking out "keg, or other vessel" and inserting in lieu thereof "or keg".

(b) Such section 3354 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is further amended by striking out the first sentence of the second proviso thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Provided further, That the tax imposed by law on fermented liquor shall be paid on all fermented liquor removed from a brewery to a bottling house by means of a pipe or conduit, at the time of such removal, by the cancelation and defacement, by the officer designated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in the presence of the brewer, of the number of stamps denoting the tax on the fermented liquor thus removed, or in such other manner as may be prescribed by regulations issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury."

(c) The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to make all rules and regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

SEC. 402. (a) All spirits, spirituous liquors, wines, and fermented liquors forfeited, summarily or by order of court, under any law of the United States, shall be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be disposed of as hereinafter provided.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury shall dispose of all spirits, spirituous liquors, wines, and fermented liquors which have been delivered to him pursuant to subsection (a)—

(1) By delivery to such Government agencies as, in his opinion, have a need for such spirits, spirituous liquors, wines, or fermented liquors for medicinal, scientific, or mechanical purposes; or

(2) By gift to such eleemosynary institutions as, in his opinion, have a need for such spirits, spirituous liquors, wines, or fermented liquors for medicinal purposes; or

(3) By sale. Notwithstanding any other provision of law all such spirits, spirituous liquors, wines, or fermented liquors so sold shall be sold subject to the payment of internal-revenue taxes and duties due thereon; or

(4) By destruction.

(c) No spirits, spirituous liquors, wines, or fermented liquors which have been seized under any law of the United States, may be disposed of in any manner whatsoever except after forfeiture and as provided in this section.

(d) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make all rules and regulations necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

SEC. 403. (a) Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury finds that there has been instituted, or that process has been issued for the institution of, any proceeding by the United States, based upon a claim arising under the customs or internal revenue laws in connection with an alleged importation or bringing into the United States of distilled spirits, wines, or fermented malt liquors, against any person, whether or not a resident of the United States, and that such person has, or at the date of the enactment of this act had, a substantial interest, direct or indirect, in any plant, establishment, or business outside of the United States for the production, manufacture, rectification, selling, or marketing of distilled spirits, wines, or fermented malt liquors, the Secretary shall publish such information as will, in his judgment, sufficiently identify such person and such plant, establishment, or business, and after such publication no distilled spirits, wines, or fermented malt liquors produced, manufactured, rectified, sold, or marketed by such person, or in which he has any interest, or produced, manufactured, rectified, sold, or marketed in or by any such plant, establishment, or business, shall be imported or brought into the United States unless and until such person submits to the jurisdiction of the court of the United States in which such proceeding has been instituted, or out of which such process has been issued, and, to secure payment of the claim, furnishes to the Secretary of the Treasury such security as he may require, but not in excess of double the amount of the claim, or complies with such other reasonable terms as he may impose.

(b) If any person fraudulently or knowingly imports or brings into the United States any distilled spirits, wines, or fermented malt liquors contrary to the provisions of this section, or any rule or regulation made hereunder, he shall be liable to a penalty in an amount equal to the value of such distilled spirits, wines, or fermented malt liquors which shall, in addition thereto, be subject to seizure and forfeiture. Any penalty or forfeiture incurred under this section may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered, and shall be treated for all purposes, as a penalty or forfeiture incurred under the customs laws and the imposition of any such penalty or forfeiture shall not be deemed to exclude the imposition of penalties or forfeitures incurred under any other provision of law.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 12, line 1, after the word "two", insert the word "personal", and after the word "sureties" insert "or one corporate surety."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

VETO MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—CONTROL OF FLOODS ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H. R. 7349, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act for the control of floods on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and for other purposes', approved May 15, 1928, as amended."

This act provides that the United States shall pay for the cost of flowage rights over all lands which were protected by the main Mississippi River levees on May 15, 1928, but which have since been left, or may hereafter be left, on the river side of the controlling main river levee lines constructed on new locations under the adopted flood-control plan.

For the reasons set forth in the accompanying report of the Secretary of War, dated August 13, 1935, I do not feel that I would be justified in giving my approval to this legislation.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 22, 1935

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and bill be referred to the Committee on Flood Control and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I notice in the morning papers that the majority leader of the Senate, Senator ROBINSON, is quoted as saying that the Senate is in position to adjourn tonight, but that the business of the House is in such shape that it will probably take until Friday or Saturday to conclude the session. If the other body is ahead of us in completing its work, it is the first time it has ever happened during my service in this House. [Applause.]

As a matter of fact, if that condition in the Senate is true, I think if the leadership of the majority will list on paper the names and numbers of bills that are absolutely necessary and leave out all of the extraordinary and unnecessary bills, we can start with that list and conclude it by 12 o'clock tonight. [Applause.] As far as I am concerned, I am willing to stay here and help do it. [Applause.] [Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER. There are many Members who have Senate bills in which they are keenly interested, which they desire to have passed, similar House bills having been recommended by House committees. There are others who are keenly interested in House bills which have gone to the Senate and some amendments have been placed thereon by the Senate, and on which some further action is necessary. The Chair is anxious to recognize all those gentlemen and give all of those bills, without exception, an opportunity to be presented to the House. As far as the Chair can do so, he is going to see that that opportunity is given. The Chair does feel that it is necessary and important, as set forth by the gentleman from New York, and for the reason that I know every Member of the House will approve, to recognize those gentlemen who have bills which are considered at least essential to passage before we adjourn. The Chair is not saying that they are essential to adjournment, but undoubtedly some of those bills will have to be passed. The Chair is going to recognize those gentlemen in charge of such bills first before he recognizes other gentlemen who have bills to which the gentleman from New York referred.

Also representations made by any and all persons, corporations, or others applying for or having received Government funds, directly or indirectly, for use in connection with any defaulted securities, reorganizations, or other similar purposes and the disposition of such funds.

THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935–36

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged report (Rept. No. 1873, H. Res. 361) for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 361

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order for the Speaker to entertain a motion to suspend the rules and pass H. R. 9215, a bill making appropriation to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged report (Rept. No. 1875, H. Res. 347) for printing in the RECORD:

House Resolution 347

Resolved, That a special committee of five be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives to investigate and report to the House not later than January 3, 1937, the campaign expenditures of the various candidates for the House of Representatives in both parties, or candidates of parties other than or independent of the Democratic or Republican Parties, the names of persons, firms, associations, or corporations subscribing, the amount contributed, the methods of collections and expenditures of such sums, and all facts in relation thereto, not only as to subscriptions of money and expenditures thereof but as to the use of any other means or influences, including the promise or use of patronage, and all other facts in relation thereto that would not only be of public interest but would aid the Congress in necessary legislation or in deciding any contests which might be instituted involving the right to a seat in the House of Representatives.

The investigation hereby provided for in all the respects above enumerated shall apply to candidates and contests before primaries, conventions, and the contests and campaigns of the general election in November of 1936, or any special election held prior to January 3, 1937. Said committee is hereby authorized to act upon its own initiative and upon such information which in its judgment may be reasonable and reliable. Upon complaint being made before such committee, under oath, by any person, persons, candidates, or political committee setting forth allegations as to facts which, under this resolution, it would be the duty of said committee to investigate, said committee shall investigate such charges as fully as though it were acting upon its own motion, unless, after hearings on such complaints, the committee shall find that such allegations in said complaints are immaterial or untrue.

That said special committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act during the adjournment of Congress, and that said committee or any subcommittee thereof is hereby empowered to sit and act at such time and place as it may deem necessary; to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents; to employ stenographers at a cost of not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Subpenas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or subcommittee thereof. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties as prescribed by law.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been approached by quite a number of Members who wish to extend their own remarks in the RECORD. On yesterday an order was made by the House that all Members should have permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD during the remainder of this session and also until the last RECORD is printed. If there are any Members present who feel that that order does not apply to them, the Chair is willing to recognize them now for the purpose of making request to extend their remarks.

TO ARGUE FOR THE USE OF GOLD AS A STANDARD OF VALUE IS AS DIFFICULT AS TO ARGUE FOR THE USE OF AN ACCORDION AS A STANDARD OF LENGTH

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include therein a letter from Edward A. Rumely to Henry Ford on an economic question. There is no politics in the letter whatever.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, under my own caption that to argue for the use of gold as a standard of value is as difficult as to argue for the use of an accordion as the standard of length, I include under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD a letter, dated July 15, 1935, to Mr. Henry Ford from Dr. Edward A. Rumely, of the Committee for the Nation.

Mr. HENRY FORD,
Dearborn, Mich.

MY DEAR MR. FORD: Your New York Times interview of July 7 restates in a convincing way the fundamentals of the American system of freedom of private enterprise, of the dependence upon the leadership and self-guidance of our entire population rather than bureaucratic, centralized control.

Isn't it a tragedy that we should have to argue today about the fundamental validity of the American system? Its fruits have proven it the most beneficial the world ever knew. Under it, within 150 years, we moved from the Atlantic to the Pacific, opened a continent with roads and railroads, built the best housing the world ever knew, made more technical inventions (such as the plow, the reaper, labor-saving agricultural tools, the cotton gin, the sewing machine, telephone, telegraph, electric light, radio, automobile transportation, and machinery for standardized mass production) than the whole of the human race had made in 2,000 years before, created greater well-being and the highest standard of living that men ever enjoyed anywhere.

It is a tragedy that we must waste time arguing the merit of that system.

Your article contains two statements that need qualification. You say:

"No other class has any economic importance. The worker's buying power is wages. The whole secret of economic stability depends upon a useful day's work for a proper day's pay."

Farmers and their dependents, 32,000,000; other basic producers, about 23,000,000; or 55,000,000—almost one-half of the population of the Nation—have their gross income and buying power determined by the prices they receive. Unlike the manufacturer who sets his own price upon his product, the man who produces wool, or wheat, or cotton, or lead, must accept what the world markets from day to day determine as the price of his products.

These 55,000,000 people are so important a part of our population that it is not true that "no other class but the wage worker has any economic importance."

It was the collapse of the buying power of our basic producers that caused the depression. In the late twenties their prices began to fall, in 1929 to plunge down in the greatest and most abrupt decline of a century. As the prices received by these 55,000,000 people for their wool, cotton, wheat, lumber, copper, lead, zinc, collapsed, their total income went down in exact proportion. Farmers' annual income declined from $11,589,000,000 for the period 1923–29 to $5,000,000,000 in round figures. It has been restored to about six and one-half billion dollars, not counting A. A. A. benefits and payments.

Let me analyze for you the farm situation: According to the Department of Agriculture, the total value of United States farm property was—

In 1920	$77,923,651,599
In 1925	57,017,740,040
In 1930	57,245,544,269
Average	64,062,311,969
Average number of farms 1920–30	6,369,544
Average value of land, buildings, machinery, livestock owned per farm was	$10,058

You know how much pioneering effort and labor have gone into the building of the average American farm. Surely there was no $10,058 worth of property anywhere that represented more honest-to-goodness labor and effort than this $10,058 of capital investment that each farmer had. If he were entitled to a 5-percent return, he would have $500 a year as profit or interest on his capital.

Let's look at the facts:

In 1934 the farmer received—

Agricultural Adjustment Administration benefit payments	$589,000,000
Plus other income	6,574,000,000
Making a total of	7,163,000,000
From this must be deducted taxes, interest, and other production expenses	2,566,000,000
The farmer had food and shelter supplied by the farm	1,097,000,000
Leaving a net cash income of	3,500,000,000
	7,163,000,000

Total cash and the value of food and living amounted to $4,597,000,000.

There were gainfully employed on the farm in 1930, 10,482,323 men.

Therefore the annual income (including living) per person gainfully employed was $430.85.

And even at this low allowance of wages for the farmers not one cent would remain for return on his capital investment, so far as his equity ownership of farm, buildings, and livestock is concerned, nothing for management nor labor of wife and children.

Can an economic system prosper in which the buying power and the return on the capital of 32,000,000 of farm producers remains reduced in this way? Can industrialists, property owners, and security owners in the city reasonably expect the farming population to stand with them, as it should, for the protection of institutions of private property if such economic injustice is allowed to prevail without an effort on the part of the financial and industrial leaders in control of our system to understand and remove the cause of this injustice?

You touch upon it in your statement—

"The manipulation of finance is often a stumbling block in agriculture as well as in industry. Take the farmer who has tilled his land, sowed his seed, and reaped his harvest. By every law of nature he should have a profit. Theoretically he has, but often he goes down to the village bank only to discover that his profit proves to be a loss. That is what a money system can do to real wealth and clear profit."

You are quite right. It is the money system that brings about this deflation injustice. But it is not conscious, human manipulation that is primarily at fault. Our economic society is in the grip of a mass idea that identifies money with a fixed weight of the one commodity gold.

Gold never was stable. It brought violent booms when it became cheap and plentiful, as after the gold discoveries in California. It brought terrible depressions that made debts almost impossible to pay, as in 1837, 1873, and 1893. But, beginning with the World War, it became the most unstable of all commodities. The table below is taken from the Mechanics of Managed Currency, by George Jackson Eder.

TABLE 1.—Variations in the value of gold in terms of wheat, cotton, pig iron, lead, and silver

	1 ounce of gold equivalent to—
	Wheat	Cotton	Pig iron	Lead	Silver
	Pounds	Pounds	Pounds	Pounds	Ounces
Year 1920	492	61	1,088	255	20
Year 1926	795	118	2,584	246	33
June 1929	1,034	110	2,584	295	39
June 1931	1,723	230	2,953	517	75
February 1933	2,584	339	3,445	689	78
Year 1933	2,034	304	3,777	678	76
Year 1934	2,176	283	4,353	893	72
Maximum variation—percent	425	456	300	263	290

The purchasing power of gold, compared with the average of the five commodities wheat, cotton, pig iron, lead, and silver, varied 347 percent. These other commodities varied far less in their exchange value for each other, viz, 77 percent in the case of wheat, 84 percent in the case of cotton, 129 percent in the case of pig iron, 105 percent in the case of lead, and 71 percent in the case of silver.

Let us follow this on one commodity, cotton: Four and six-tenths ounces of gold bought a bale of cotton in 1929; 3.1 ounces of gold bought a bale of cotton in 1930; 2.1 ounces of gold bought a bale of cotton in 1931; 1.6 ounces of gold bought a bale of cotton in 1932; 1.6 ounces of gold bought a bale of cotton in 1933; 1.8 ounces of gold bought a bale of cotton in 1934; 1.7 ounces of gold buys a bale of cotton in 1935.

In other words, merely because over in Europe panic and war preparation and hoarding changed the value of gold, the million families growing cotton in the South had their price per bale cut down by $40 or $50. Instead of 21 cents a pound, the markets give them 11 to 12 cents. Is there any justice in this?

Suppose some force operating in Europe could reach over to Detroit and suddenly cut the price of your automobile in two, cut the wages that you are paying to employees in half—could the industry survive? Yet that is exactly what the fixed weight of gold standard has done to the cotton growers and other farmers and other basic producers—55,000,000 of our population.

Mr. Russell Leffingwell, of J. P. Morgan & Co., said of the increase in the buying power of gold:

"Gold is not an end in itself. It is a means to an end. That end is monetary stability. * * * When the value of gold rises, prices and wages fall and the horrible cycle of deflation, with its terrible consequences in human suffering, begins to revolve toward the abyss. Then the only hope for humanity was to stop gold payments—to go off gold."

You more than almost any industrial leader have recognized that we are suffering not from inability of machinery nor unwillingness of labor or management to perform their parts, but from a break-down in our monetary mechanism of exchange. In fact, you said, in the American Magazine of October 1934:

"There is no doubt that financiers have failed to do their best to give us an efficient money system. And yet it was their principal business to do that.

"The function of money is not to make money but to move goods. Money is only one part of our transportation system. It moves goods from man to man. A dollar bill is like a postage stamp; it is no good unless it will move commodities between persons. If a postage stamp will not carry a letter, or money will not move goods, it is just the same as an engine that will not run. Someone will have to get out and fix it."

But in spite of this, you are withholding the tremendous constructive influence that you could and should release, in view of the importance of the problem. Think of it—10,000,000 of unemployed, the youth of the country so frustrated and hampered in getting its fair start in life that it is turning radical; the Government trying every kind of absurd remedy simply because monetary derangement frustrates private enterprise and keeps the various economic groups that should be trading with each other in such a stepladder of monetary unbalance that their products cannot move smoothly from one to another.

If you heard from your factory department that the pound weight, or the foot measure, or the gallon measure were shrinking or expanding 1 percent in a year you would spend $1,000,000, $5,000,000, $10,000,000 until you had put a stop to it. But here you have a 347-percent change in what the dollar measure of value buys, that makes our economic life a turmoil, that caused the farmer a reduction of $22,000,000,000 of their normal buying power between 1929 and 1934, that threw hundreds of thousands into bankruptcy—and the efforts to correct this are so mild that they have no influence upon the problem. One of the keenest observers of businessmen in the United States writes:

"Perhaps the best work your Committee for the Nation has done is in forcing businessmen to think about finance, to bring them to some realization that, since they do business with money, they must find out what money is. Even so, the lack of interest of businessmen generally in the pending bank bill is a tragic commentary on American business in general. It seems to pay attention to everything except the one thing that is most vital. None of our great industrialists appeared to testify in connection with the pending bank bill, the formulation of which has been left almost entirely to experts. These experts are accustomed to deal with money as money, whereas money to an industrialist is an active force in securing production. It is part of the machinery wherewith he makes his goods and is not, to him, a sort of rabbit on the fecundity of which he must depend (money reproducing itself through interest charges). It were better for the businessmen of America, perhaps, to have wrong ideas about sound principles of money than to have no ideas at all."

Isn't it time for you, Mr. Ford, and the Ford Motor Co., to lend support to the establishment of a stable measure of value that will compare with the support you have given to the establishment of your marvelous gages by which the measurement of distance is kept constant to within a millionth of an inch? Only in this way can we get a stable measure of value—a dollar which, in the words of President Roosevelt, "will have the same purchasing and debt-paying power as the dollar value we hope to attain in the near future."

Here the accepted habits of thought, more difficult to dislodge than the illusion that the earth was flat, have to be broken down. It is not easy, but with concerted and intelligent effort and the example of England before our eyes the task is within our powers.

Very truly yours,

COMMITTEE FOR THE NATION,
By EDWARD A. RUMELY.

SAFEGUARDING THE PUBLIC INTEREST IN RADIO

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein a speech delivered at Cornell University by Commissioner George Henry Payne of the Radio Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, is there any politics in that?

Mr. MEAD. There is no politics and the speech is not very long. He is a Republican.

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address of George Henry Payne, Federal Communications Commissioner, at Cornell University, under the auspices of the American Association of Agricultural College Editors, August 21, 1935:

I can imagine no happier thought than inviting a member of the Federal Communications Commission to speak on Safeguarding the Public Interest in Radio. Indeed, it is as much of a challenge as it is an invitation.

In the first place, the members of the Federal Communications Commission are sworn to safeguard the interest of the public. They would be doing less than their duty if they did not seize every opportunity to do so. Unfortunately there is a division of opinion as to how that public interest is to be best safeguarded. First among those who favor the status quo come the commercial broadcasters, naturally, and then there are many who would like to see the programs improved but believe that improvement will come naturally in the course of time, "out of the air", as it were. Such advocates of laissez faire point out the dangers of governmental ownership where the radio is used mainly for propagandists' purposes and cite the superiority of many of the splendid features of American broadcasting as against the pale and mildly interesting broadcasting of the British company, Government controlled and partly Government owned.

Against these are opposed most of the institutions of learning, educators, publicists, and others who admit that part of the programs are occasionally superior but are strongly in favor of educational programs and higher standards of broadcasting.

To appropriate the situation in our own country, it is necessary to consider broadcasting as it is carried on by other governments. In Great Britain advertising is absolutely prohibited, as it is in Japan. As a matter of fact, advertising over the radio is absolutely unknown in any foreign country, except to a very limited extent in France and Spain.

I have here a copy of the report on radio broadcasting prepared for Senator BURTON K. WHEELER by Mr. S. Howard Evans. It is one of the ablest documents that I have read on the present problems and perplexities of the entire broadcasting situation. It has the unusual quality of meeting these problems with complete frankness and courage; and while some of the suggestions made, such as that for "legislation compelling a complete reallocation of broadcasting facilities" and the one compelling "all radio licensees owning radio patents to put them in a patents pool", will stir up a great deal of agitation and discussion, I cannot see but that the discussion, even on these two moot points, will be beneficial.

Inasmuch as Senator WHEELER has given me permission to quote from the report, which has hitherto been regarded as confidential, I am hoping that in due time he will see his way to having it printed and give it the broadest possible circulation, and that a discussion of the matters gone into most thoroughly therein will give the public some idea as to what the problems are and how necessary it is to concentrate on them if there is to be improvement.

In the brief time that we have for this discussion today, and in keeping to the subject allotted to me, I should like to quote from Mr. Evans' report his very pointed suggestion as to the establishment of a bureau of standards with regard to the character of programs by those stations applying for licenses:

"One possible way to extend protection", he says, "might be through the establishment of a procedure with regard to the programs of stations similar to that which the Commission now requires in connection with the technical operation of stations. The Commission has decreed standards of mechanical operation to which stations must conform. It has required stations to put in new equipment and to change existing equipment so that they may render better technical service. Had the Commission set forth these technical requirements for a single station, it would have been guilty of a kind of discrimination which could not have been sustained in the courts. However, when the Commission merely insisted on standards which could be applied to all stations equally, the courts consistently supported its action.

"It seems reasonable to believe that the Commission could establish similar general standards for program service. Certainly there are standards which can be applied. If they are applied without discrimination, the probability is that the courts will sustain the Commission in insisting on them.

* * * * * * *

"The Commission might compel every station in applying for a license to submit not only evidence of its financial and technical qualifications but also a statement of the standards which it would require programs to meet. This would be demanding on the program side of broadcasting nothing more than the Commission has required for a long time with regard to technical matters. It would be compelling the chains and independent stations to apply to every hour of their operating schedules the same kind of program standards which the chains have applied advantageously to religion."

* * * * * * *

"Somehow the Communications Commission has to accept responsibility for the kind of programs broadcast over stations which the Commission has in granting their licenses certified to be operating in the public interest. If the Commission cannot exercise this control through the requirement of standards, some other method must be found."

Of all the great human discoveries and inventions, the radio had in the most spectacular fashion changed the world aspect of human relations in the shortest possible time.

The invention of the printing press was followed by centuries of unchanged conditions in the most enlightened countries, and it was only as men came to realize that the press must be free that it fulfilled its noblest function of making men free.

Since the beginning of broadcasting in 1921, the radio, in this country at least, has outstripped the press in its contact with human beings. In approximately 15 years it has achieved the position of having more listeners than the press has readers, although the press has been in existence for 500 years. It has the advantage that many can listen who cannot read.

This is all very thrilling, dramatic, and impressive, but when we stop to realize that the radio in this country is practically entirely in the hands of those interested solely in its commercial aspects we are inclined to wonder what might have happened to civilization if the press had been for about 500 years controlled by commercial agencies, and educational and political reformers had been unable to get their ideas into circulation because the commercial control found it could make more money by appealing to the tastes and interests of the less intelligent rather than the more intelligent.

The newspaper has its commercial aspects too. It has its faults and its defects, but from the founding of the paper Publick Occurances (the first paper to be printed on this continent) by Benjamin Harris on September 25, 1690, it has presented a splendid picture in the fight for human rights, its war against political corruption, its battle for liberty of the oppressed and enslaved and its refusal to be intimidated by either power or wealth. The radio battles for no rights.

In the safeguarding of the public interest we must be wary not to let false ideas creep into the public consciousness through subtle propaganda by those uninterested in public rights. No matter how honest may have been the original thought there is fundamental danger in the idea, more or less casually advanced, that the broadcasting business constitutes a fifth estate in our Government.

The idea is not apt to get far as it is based on complete ignorance of history and our social and political development. It was Edmund Burke, who, according to Carlyle, said that there were three estates in Parliament "but in the reporters' gallery there sat a fourth estate, more important far than they all."

It is because the people, through their Government, will not tolerate the creation of a fifth estate that they have, in the exercise of their sovereignty, taken over the control of the air and have passed the laws regulating the use of the air. It was to prevent the creation of a radio political power that the Federal Communications Commission was brought into existence.

There is no doubt that if the Government had been lax in exercising its rights or if it should cease to exert its power of regulation there might arise another estate that would be more powerful than the people's Government and that fourth estate, which, as an unfettered and free press, has been the right arm in the development of democracy and popular institutions.

"A people may prefer a free government", said John Stuart Mill, "but if from indolence, or carelessness, or cowardice, or want of public spirit they are unequal to the exertions necessary to preserve it; if they will not fight for it when it is directly attacked; if they can be deluded by the artifices used to cheat them out of it * * * in all these cases they are more or less unfit for liberty."

ANTIDUMPING BILL

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a proposed new antidumping bill known as "H. R. 8603", which is designed to change the present law which was enacted in 1921. Realizing that in the closing days of the session there is no chance of having this enacted at this session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, I have prepared a statement in explanation of the bill and in explanation of the purposes of the proposed measure. I ask unanimous consent that that be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

It has become my duty to speak frankly and openly of competitive conditions which affect thousands of workers and large investments in industry. Not only do these matters concern the people of my congressional district but they are interfering with employment in many other parts of the United States. I speak of stifling foreign competition, principally from low-cost producing countries, which is retarding recovery.

This is not a plea for higher tariffs; it is an effort to make the Membership of the House of Representatives realize how serious the situation is which confronts many American workers. No tariff could cure these ills. With the depreciated currency of Japan, the desire of Russia to dispose of its manufactures, even if resort to dumping must be had, with the monopolistic control of most of the foreign markets by the Swedish match trust, only embargoes, strictly limiting quotas or an antidumping act based upon American production costs will suffice.

Perhaps the theory of reciprocal tariffs is sound, but I'll venture to say that few, if any, upon my side of the House would favor lowering the barriers upon foreign merchandise which is produced in ample quantity and in as good or better quality in the United States. If this be the object of reciprocal tariffs, we want none of it. On the other hand, most of us believed such agreements were designed to stimulate trade between the nations by fixing a more favorable import status for those articles, either agricultural or manufactured, which did not compete and would not compete adversely with American products. In the same manner our exports to the other nations signatory to the agreements would be the products which would not be detrimental to their economic development.

I have introduced H. R. 8603, a proposed new dumping act which would repeal the Antidumping Act of 1921. Dumping, as far as the United States is concerned, may be said to be the practice of a foreign nation or nations exporting to this country goods and merchandise in wholesale quantities, to be here sold or freely offered for sale at prices below the current market price of such merchandise in the country of origin or below the price at which such merchandise is sold or offered for sale in other countries to which it is exported, other than the United States.

It was to avoid this practice that the so-called "Antidumping Act of 1921" was passed. This imposed a special dumping duty, which obligated the Secretary of the Treasury to collect a sum, representing the difference between the foreign market value or in the absence of such value, the foreign cost of production and the purchase price in this country or the price at which the goods were offered for sale in this country.

It was the well-intentioned purpose of this act and it was thought that, through the collection of this special dumping duty, which was in addition to all tariff duties and other duties imposed by law, that the American manufacturer and producer would be protected against the unloading of wholesale quantities of merchandise by low-cost producing countries at prices below the sale price of similar merchandise in the markets of the world. These fond hopes have not been realized.

For the last several years there has been a continuing influx of merchandise from Japan, Russia, and other countries, which is proving ruinous to the American business men and to the employees in many industries.

This situation has been greatly accentuated, due to the world-wide depression, with ensuing devalued currencies, so that the selling price of merchandise in the world markets and in the countries of production, due to these low-cost producers, are such that an antidumping duty, such as the act of 1921, based upon the yardstick of prices which it established, is of no value at the present time.

The amount collected by the Treasury as special dumping duties under the act of 1921 clearly illustrates the impotency of this law. We must have a new antidumping statute that will protect the American manufacturer and the American workingman from the stifling competition which is ever on the increase from Japan and other low-cost-producing nations.

A new measure of value must be fixed, and in the bill that has been introduced we seek to make the American cost of production the base from which to operate.

It is the intent of the bill to impose a duty equal to the difference between the importer's sales price of the imported article and the American cost of production of a like, similar, or competitive article manufactured or produced and freely offered for sale in the United States, such levy to be in addition to all other duties imposed by law on the importation of such merchandise.

The proposed measure (H. R. 8603) repeals the Antidumping Act of 1921. Section 2 thereof contains certain definitions and also defines and sets forth the method of determining the American cost of production of merchandise.

Section 3 makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to receive complaints relative to the sale or offering for sale of imported merchandise in the United States at a price less than the American cost of production and directs the Secretary to publish a notice of dumping, covering the classes or kinds of merchandise complained of.

Section 4 authorizes the imposition of the special dumping duty, which I have already discussed.

Section 5 provides for the giving of a bond by the importer in the case of any article as to which the Secretary has caused notice to be published as provided in section 3. The bond is to be given at the time of the entry of the merchandise and is conditioned, first, that the importer will report to the collector the importer's sales price of the article within 30 days after the same has been sold or agreed to be sold in the United States; second, that he will pay to the collector a special dumping duty if any is imposed; and, third, that he will furnish to the collector such information as may be in his possession and as may be necessary for the ascertainment of such duty, and will keep such records as to the sale and offers for sale of such article as the Secretary may, by regulation, prescribe.

Section 6 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to make such regulations and exact such bonds as are necessary to carry out the provisions of the act, and further authorizes him to require of the complainant, as an evidence of good faith, a bond in an amount not exceeding $1,000.

Section 7 provides that the appraiser or person acting as appraiser, in addition to his other duties prescribed by law, shall ascertain and report to the collector the importer's sales price and the American cost of production of any article on which the Secretary has caused notice to be published as provided in section 3.

Section 8 gives the right of appeal to the United States Customs Court and the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals.

Section 9 further relates to court jurisdiction, the imposition of penalties for the making of frivolous complaints and appellate jurisdiction thereon.

This is a brief summary of the provisions of the bill. It is the firm conviction of the author and of those who have collaborated with him in seeking a remedy for the present intolerable conditions that by making the American cost of production the yardstick to measure importer's sales prices in this country that we will stimulate American trade and industry; we will prevent the flooding of the American market with cheap merchandise, against which we cannot compete under our standards of living, and at the same time we will not prevent competition.

The argument has been made that the enactment of this proposed measure will violate the Reciprocal Tariff Act and prevent the making of the agreements with various countries pursuant to such act.

If reciprocal agreements are to be made according to the real spirit of that act and pursuant to the explanation of the chairman of the committee and other administration leaders who helped steer the measure through the House of Representatives, the interests of American manufacturers and of the American workingman were always to be considered and no agreements were in contemplation or would be tolerated which would be inimical to American Industry.

If we can rely upon those statements and if in the making of reciprocal trade agreements the State Department will confine the giving of tariff advantage to articles of import which are either not produced in this country or where the cost of American production and the foreign cost of production are not at wide variance, then there should be no conflict between this proposed measure, H. R. 8603, and reciprocal tariffs.

Industry in practically every industrial section of this Nation is affected by the ruinous competition of these low-cost producing countries. It may be the large manufacturer in your district or in mine, but in more instances it is the small business man with his score or a few hundred workmen who are suffering along with him by this failure to maintain the American market for the American-produced merchandise.

It is impossible to give you a complete list of all the different lines of domestic industry that are adversely affected by the influx of Japanese and Russian articles. Go into any 5- and 10-cent store, 25 to dollar store, or department store and you will find upon the counters numerous articles of foreign manufacture which are supplanting the American counterpart produced by American labor in this country. The workers in the porcelain and pottery plants in the United States are suffering grievously from this type of competition. So are those employed by the cutlery manufacturers, those employed in the rug and carpet industry, the toy industry, molded rubber goods, and druggists' sundries, lace manufacturers, the paper industry, leather-glove manufacturers, those engaged in the production of matches, glassware, fishing tackle and anglers' supplies, and many other forms of industry too numerous to mention.

Let me quote to you several examples of the results of this competition which have been brought to my personal attention by manufacturers and their labor in my own congressional district in Ohio. A manufacturer of molded rubber toys in Akron has an up-to-date, modern plant and in November of 1933 was employing 445 individuals. The 2-week pay roll ending on November 11, 1933, in that factory amounted to $15,414.72. On November 10, 1934, there were 196 individuals employed, and the 2-week pay roll amounted to $7,608.48. While this company manufactures rubber goods other than toys, its miscellaneous business actually increased in 1934 over 1933, so the shrinkage in employment and pay roll is due to the competition of foreign imports.

The mode of operation of the importers and the Japanese manufacturers is this: As soon as one of our domestic companies brings out a new model in toys the importers immediately purchase samples and forward them by the fastest known means of transportation to Japan, where they are immediately copied, and within a few months the counters of American chain stores and department stores are flooded with the Japanese imitation. It is said that the Japanese race originates no new ideas nor have they added in any considerable measure to human knowledge, but they are the greatest imitators on the face of the globe. We exclude Japanese immigration, but we increase American unemployment by continuously allowing increasing importations from that country.

Let me bring to your attention some specific figures relative to American and Japanese costs in another line of industry. We manufacture a fine line of fishing tackle and accessories in my district in Ohio.

Here are a few comparative examples of American and Japanese costs:

Feathered jugs from Japan come in at about $14.40 per gross, duty paid and delivered, as compared with the United States manufacturers' cost of about $21.75 per gross for the same size.

Japanese imitations of United States fly reels are delivered at $2.51 and $3.90 per dozen, against an Ohio producer's cost of about $4.20 per dozen.

Japanese snelled hooks delivered at about $1, $1.06, and $1.41 per gross against United States manufacturers' cost of approximately $1.35 to $2, respectively.

Japanese fishhooks, c. i. f. San Francisco, for less than the cost of the wire alone to United States producers.

Japanese gut leaders delivered at 31 cents to 84 cents per gross, against United States cost of $1.46 to $1.73, respectively, for equivalent test and lengths.

Japanese knotless gut lines delivered at about 11½ cents, against our own fishing-line producers' cost of about 18 cents to 22 cents for the cheapest grade of lines of equivalent test and lengths.

Japanese artificial flies delivered at less than 75 cents per hundred, against United States fly tiers' costs of not less than $1.75 for labor and material alone, with no allowance for overhead and other necessary expense.

Japanese jointed bamboo poles are sold and delivered to this country at about one-half the cost to produce here.

From these prices one can readily visualize what the domestic producer is up against. Unless we stem the tide of this increasing foreign competition, many American manufacturers will have to close their shops and our short-sighted policy will add to the number of unemployed in the United States.

Another industry which is bearing the brunt of foreign competition and which is greatly concerned over conversations, which, it understands, are taking place with reference to further reciprocal trade agreements, is the match industry. Under the reciprocal agreement recently made with Sweden, the industry was forced to take a 12½-percent tariff reduction. Under the favored-nation clause, Russia and Japan will gain as well as Sweden.

In the district which I represent, there are three large match factories, independent of each other and each employing hundreds of American citizens. Matches are there made under ideal conditions, in well-lighted, ventilated, modern buildings, where every effort is made to safeguard the health of the employees.

This industry faces competition principally from Sweden, Russia, and Japan. Due to the monopoly of the Swedish Match Trust, which controls match sales in some 30 countries, together with low-cost production in Russia and Japan, the only market available to the American manufacturer is our domestic market. Our exports of matches are negligible.

We have the raw material; we have the manufacturing facilities in this country, more than sufficient to supply the domestic demand. Every box of imported matches displaces domestic materials and labor. And yet this industry has had to endure some of the cruelest competition from foreign sources of any that I know of.

This situation is complicated because of the match empire built up by the late Swedish impostor, Ivar Kreuger. Many Americans were his dupes, and the disappointed American bondholders are continuously endeavoring to further their interests by having the Swedish Match Trust given favorable consideration through lowered tariffs and import quotas.

Just to give you some idea of the increasing importation of matches made in Japan, and the chief type of match imported is the so-called "strike-on-box match", with which we are familiar and which may be purchased in any cigar store, drug store, or corner store in this country for a penny a box: Our domestic consumption of matches at the present time is about 8,000,000 gross boxes per year. There was imported into this country from the three principal importing nations in the year of 1932, 3,375,642 gross boxes of matches. Of this total, Sweden sent in 1,782,835 gross boxes, or 53 percent of the total; the Soviet Union, 650,312 gross boxes, or 19 percent of the total imports; and Japan, 276,824 gross boxes, or 8 percent of all imports.

There was imported into this country from the three principal importing nations in the year 1933, 3,720,807 gross boxes of matches. Of this total, Sweden sent in 552,774 gross boxes, or 15 percent of the total; the Soviet Union, 484,585 gross boxes, or 13 percent of the total imports; and Japan, 2,614,559 gross boxes, or 70 percent of all imports.

There was imported into this country, from all sources in the year 1934, 3,268,338 gross boxes of matches. Of this total, Sweden sent in 531,090 gross boxes, or 16.2 percent; the Soviet Union, 1,313,200 gross boxes, or 40.2 percent of the total imports; Japan, 1,265,332 gross boxes, or 38.7 percent of the total imports; and all other countries, 158,716 gross boxes, or 4.9 percent of all imports.

These figures demonstrate that the imports of the strike-on-box type of wood match are very substantial. In fact, between three-eighths and one-half of present domestic consumption is supplied by matches of foreign manufacture. Do you favor a further influx of these low-cost-production matches?

Most of the recently imported matches have been sold at prices below the cost of production of similar matches made in the United States. In addition, domestic costs of production have been increased materially as a result of operation under the code. Imports, therefore, seriously endanger the operation of the domestic industry under the code.

Let us consider why American costs of production are greater than in Japan and in other countries. A comparison of labor costs in the Japanese match industry with the wages paid by our domestic producers is well worth consideration.

The Japanese Department of Commerce and Industry compiled official average daily wage figures in the Japanese match industry for the month of January 1934. (Factories of size only are considered and small operators and home workers ignored.) Of course the figures compiled are in Japanese yen. The equivalent in United States currency is:

Average, not minimum, for men, 31.2 cents per day.

Average, not minimum, for women, 14.4 cents per day, and this for a full working day of 10 hours or more duration. On a basis of an average working day of 10.4 hours, stated as a recent average in Japanese factories, the average pay is 3 cents per hour (in American money) for men, 1.4 cents per hour for women.

The wage index, as prepared by the Bank of Japan, shows that in recent years wages have lowered and wages continued to drop even after the yen depreciated in value on the foreign exchange from some 50 cents to 20 cents United States value. No attention with respect to official wage statistics is paid to home workers.

Home work is performed in conjunction with factory work at all average size and at all small match factories in Japan, as well as in many of the larger ones. Home work is piecework and sweat-shop labor and part of it is done by little children, working all hours of the day, outside of the compulsory school hours.

The American match industry, while working under the N. R. A. and the Match Code, had a stipulated minimum (not average) wage rate of 38 cents per hour for men and 30 cents per hour for women, with a working week of 40 hours. In Japan the corresponding wage paid is some 3 cents per hour for men, about 1¼ cents per hour for women, and only a fraction of a cent per hour for children, and females do more than three-fourths of the work of matchmaking in Japan.

The American worker expects and is entitled to a decent living wage, and it is unthinkable to believe that we would permit further encroachments upon the income of labor employed in this industry by foreign competition with countries paying such wages.

We could go on and give many other examples showing the far-reaching and disturbing effects upon employment in this country of the influx of foreign imports. None of us like to think of American workmen being compelled to accept the wages and living conditions of Japan and Soviet Russia. We are going to lick the depression and we are going to do it in the American way and not by reducing labor in this country to wages and conditions comparable to those of the peasant classes of low-cost producing countries.

Do you find Italy, France, Germany, and England giving up the production of automobiles and the building of internal-combustion engines just because the United States is equipped to manufacture all of the automobiles and motors that the world can use more efficiently and more cheaply than any other nation?

None of us but wish to see an increase in world trade, but it must be upon a fair basis. We must not allow visionary idealists to lead us so far afield in search of new markets that we permit the ruination of the domestic market, which is the natural one for the products of our own labor and skill.

WASHINGTON'S PLEA FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the military policy of George Washington and to insert in connection therewith a letter addressed by our colleague, Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of New York, referring to an address, and incorporating the same, recently delivered by Brigadier General Palmer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, two ideas and systems of thought, each contrary and opposed to the other, have prevailed with regard to the proper philosophy of national defense in America.

One is the so-called "large national army" principle, whereby in the event of an emergency all of the unorganized militia will be formed into a great national army officered and controlled by those who constitute the Regular Army in peace time. The other is based upon the idea that there should be civilian components organized in peace times, such as the National Guard and the Organized Reserves, who go into our defense forces in time of war in their separate and independent organizations. Fortunately, by the National Defense Act of 1916 and especially the act of 1920, the chief reliance of America in the event of war is placed upon the civilian components of the National Guard and the Organized Reserves. Of course, the Regular Army and the National Guard and the Organized Reserves must be filled up to war strength from the organized militia.

A great exponent of the philosophy of placing reliance and emphasis upon the civilian components is Brig. Gen. John McAuley Palmer, United States Army, retired. His first book in exposition of this philosophy is entitled "Statesmanship or War." The preface or introduction to that book was written by the then United States Senator, JAMES W. WADSWORTH, then Chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, now an honored and useful Member of the House of Representatives. Mr. WADSWORTH described graphically the great part General Palmer took in the formulation of the National Defense Act of 1920. Subsequently, General Palmer made a most thorough investigation of the unpublished history of our defense forces, and discovered some manuscripts from the pen of George Washington that throw a flood of light upon his conception of the proper organization of land forces. The manuscript that had been unknown to the general public for much more than a hundred years was entitled by George Washington "Sentiments on a Peace Establishment." The result of these later researches by General Palmer was compiled in a book written by himself entitled "The Three War Presidents: Washington, Lincoln, and Wilson."

I am extending my remarks by including a letter from our colleague, Mr. WADSWORTH, dated August 20, 1935, addressed to Col. Orvel Johnson, who is director general of the R. O. T. C. Association of the United States. I am also including as a part of my remarks an address delivered by General Palmer at a meeting of the R. O. T. C. Association of the United States in New York City on April 30, 1935. Though I have read both of the books above mentioned by General Palmer, I was very interested in hearing his address delivered at said time. It is a most comprehensive and precise statement of the military philosophy of George Washington and of many of the principles of our best and greatest soldiers and statesmen, including General Wood, General Pershing, and many others.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 20, 1935.

Col. ORVEL JOHNSON,
Director General R. O. T. C. Association of the United States,
Woodward Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR COLONEL JOHNSON: I am sure I am speaking for the Senators and Representatives who, as members of the Military Affairs Committees of the House and Senate, respectively, back in 1919 and 1920, spent many months drafting the extensive revision of the National Defense Act, when I say that that work could not have been done as it was done without the help of John McA. Palmer, then a lieutenant colonel and now a brigadier general, retired, in the Regular Army. And I am sure these same men will agree with me when I say that General Palmer knows more about the military history of the United States than any person now living. Not only has he been an excellent soldier but he has devoted much of his life to historical research. In this field he has been actuated by a keen desire to help formulate a military policy for the United States which would be in accord with our democratic traditions and at the same time provide a completely effective defense for the Nation. General Palmer's ambitions were very largely fulfilled when, as official advisor of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs in 1919 and 1920, he helped and guided us in the drafting of a new National Defense Act. Fifteen years have gone by since that time and the act which he inspired, very largely, is working with extraordinary success. General Palmer has recently delivered a most interesting speech before the national convention of the R. O. T. C. Association of the United States, in which he tells the whole story. It is a document of genuine historical importance which should be read by every thoughtful American. It is my earnest hope that it will receive wide circulation, not only in military circles but in the schools and colleges of the land.

Very sincerely yours,

J. W. WADSWORTH.

WASHINGTON NATIONAL DEFENSE PLAN

(Address by Brig. Gen. John McAuley Palmer, U. S. Army, retired, before national meeting of the R. O. T. C. Association of the United States, New York City, Apr. 30, 1935)

When Washington became President, 146 years ago today, he had two main planks in his administration platform. His first plank called for a sound financial system; his second plank called for a sound military system.

Thanks to the genius of Alexander Hamilton, the first plank was installed before the end of Washington's first administration. But it took exactly 131 years, 1 month, and 20 days to get his second plank through Congress.

It is perhaps the highest tribute that can be paid to Hamilton and his successors that they have been able to borrow enough money and levy enough taxes to pay for the wastes of public wealth that have poured through that unfilled gap in our national structure. For unprepared warfare has been the main source of all our great funded debts. If Washington had been able to nail in both planks of his administration platform, we would have no great national debt today—and probably no depression.

While Washington was able to intrust Hamilton with the development of his financial policy it is a remarkable fact that he gave his personal attention to the development of his military policy. From the close of the Revolution to the end of his administration as President, and thereafter to the end of his life, he gave more of his personal attention to this than to any other public question. Here, for 16 years, we find his most consistent efforts as a constructive statesman. As this phase of his history is not generally known, I shall tell the story briefly.

On April 13, 1783, 6 days before the formal "cessation of hostilities" with Great Britain, Washington received a letter from the Continental Congress asking his "sentiments at large" upon the future defense of the new Republic. On the following day, he wrote to all of his generals who were stationed at or near the headquarters at Newburgh for their views upon this interesting question. He also wrote in the same sense to George Clinton, the Governor of New York.

Replies were received from these gentlemen within the next 10 days. All, with two exceptions, concurred in substance with Baron von Steuben who stated his views concisely as follows:

"A chain of small posts along the frontiers, as much for protection of trade as to be a check for the Indians, a well-organized militia, and the establishment of military schools, and manufactories is all that will be necessary for our security."

In his letter of transmittal the Baron also said:

"A system of this nature will make us more respectable with the powers of Europe than if we keep up an army of 50,000 men."

I quote Steuben rather than the other generals because he occupied a unique position among them. The others, from Washington down, were all citizen soldiers. The Baron was a professional military expert who had served on the general staff of Frederick the Great during the Seven Years' War.

Governor Clinton's views are also worth mentioning. He proposed military instruction in the colleges. Here, so far as I know, is the first suggestion of our modern R. O. T. C. Perhaps you gentlemen should canonize Gov. George Clinton as your patron saint.

After studying the papers submitted by his generals, Washington completed his own report to Congress on May 1, 1783. This remarkable document bears the title, "Sentiments on a Peace Establishment." In it, Washington amplified the policy suggested by Steuben and his other generals. As his main reliance for defense he proposed "A well-organized militia, upon a plan that will pervade all the States, and introduce similarity in their establishments, maneuvers, exercises, and arms."

One of the most interesting things in this document is Washington's explanation of what he meant by a "well-organized militia." He discusses this question at length, but the gist of his views is very simple. It was his wish that a sufficient fraction of the younger men in each community should be set apart and given uniform organization and training in time of peace. When he referred to a "well-organized" or a "well-regulated militia", he had in mind a force like our modern National Guard.

Washington also proposed a small regular army to guard the Indian frontier and to perform other necessary duties that obviously cannot be performed by citizen soldiers in time of peace. He wanted enough regular soldiers for these specific limited duties and no more.

The conception of a standing army as an integral part of our national defense structure had no place in Washington's plan. Such a conception did not originate in America until after the War of 1812. It is true that Washington frequently referred to regular troops during the course of the Revolutionary War. But here he was always referring to the Continental Army, a force that was composed solely of citizen soldiers from the commander in chief down to the newest recruit. It was in order to assure an effective Continental Army for our future wars that he was now proposing à "well-regulated militia" in time of peace.

Washington's proposals were considered by a committee of Congress, but no action was possible at that time. The country was bankrupt and there was no effective national union. In the course of the year the Continental Army was disbanded. At the end of the year Washington relinquished command and withdrew to Mount Vernon.

But during this year Baron Steuben was busy working on a complete plan of national defense. It is remarkable that in this plan he proposed the essential features that were embodied 136 years later in the National Defense Act of 1920. In his three geographical departments he proposed a territorial military organization such as we now have in our corps areas. He proposed "continental militia", as he called it, similar in all essentials to our modern National Guard. This force was to comprise young volunteers drawn from the general body of the militia, who were to receive 1 month's field training with their organization each year. This "continental militia" was to be organized in 7 small territorial divisions, or legions, as the Baron called them, 2 to be formed in the New England department, 3 in the middle department, and 2 in the South Atlantic department. Each of these legions was to have a strength of 3,000 men and was to comprise infantry, artillery, and cavalry in their proper proportions for combined operations.

It will be noted that Steuben's divisions or legions were very small. But here, in fact, he experienced remarkable ingenuity. If he had proposed large divisions in such a vast and sparsely settled country, each divisional area would have been so big that it could never have been possible to assemble the whole division for training in time of peace. But it would be possible to assemble his small legions for training; and as each would comprise artillery and cavalry as well as infantry, each year's training would include maneuvers in combined tactics. This was a remarkable feature in Steuben's plan. For here he was proposing territorial divisional areas in America long before the same conception was developed in Europe.

If his legions made rather small divisions at the start, that would be automatically corrected in the future. The divisions would be able to grow with the growth of population in the divisional areas.

The baron proposed 21,000 as the proper strength for his Continental Militia, or National Guard. If it had been established then and permitted to grow with the growth of population, its present strength would be more than 700,000 men.

Steuben also proposed a small regular army as a guard for the Indian frontier, with a military academy and a supply establishment in each of his territorial departments. If this organization had been adopted we should have been adequately prepared for all of our subsequent wars from the War of 1812 to the World War.

When his plan was completed, Steuben sent it to Mount Vernon for Washington's consideration. On the 15th of March 1784, Washington replied in part as follows:

"I have perused, with attention, the plan which you have formed for establishing a continental legion, and for training a certain part of the arms-bearing men of the Union as a militia in times of peace, and with the small alterations which have been suggested and made, I very much approve of it. It was no unpleasing and flattering circumstance to me to find such a coincidence of ideas as appears to run through your plan and the one I had the honor to lay before Congress in May last. Mine, however, was a hasty production, the consequence of a sudden call and little time for arrangement, yours of mature thought and better digestion * * * I can think of no plan more likely to answer the purpose than the one you have suggested, which, the principles being established, may be enlarged or diminished according to circumstances. It therefore meets my approbation, and has my best wishes for its success."

Here we have a national-defense organization, prepared by one of the most accomplished professional soldiers of the eighteenth century and approved by the greatest citizen-soldier of all time. Why was it not adopted until 136 years later? In the answer to this question we find one of the most dramatic series of incidents in our national history. (After receiving Washington's approval, the baron published his plan in a pamphlet entitled "A Letter on the Subject of an Established Militia and Military Arrangements Addressed to the Inhabitants of the United States, 1784." There are copies of this rare pamphlet in the Library of Congress, the library of Harvard College, and other collections.)

Five years later, when Washington became President, he immediately began to prepare a national-defense plan to be submitted to Congress. An entry in his diary shows that he carefully compared the militia systems of Europe, his own plan of 1783, Steuben's plan of 1784, and a modification of Steuben's plan made by the Secretary of War, General Knox, in 1786. Knox's organizational structure was the same as Steuben's, but he proposed compulsory training and service instead of voluntary training and service.

Washington decided to recommend this more comprehensive plan. Then, if Congress should decide to reject the principle of compulsory training and service, there would still remain Steuben's organizational structure on the voluntary basis. He therefore sent the Knox plan to Congress on January 1, 1790.

The Knox plan was not favorably received in Congress. In the first place, it was badly written and difficult to understand. In the second place, Knox was a poor politician. In his letter of transmittal he said that his proposed continental militia would protect the United States from internal as well as external enemies. Further on he stressed his opinion "that the Government should possess a strong corrective arm." These expressions were bad politics just at that time. Many popular leaders believed that the new Federal Government already had too much coercive power. At a time when Congress was safeguarding the liberties of the people by enacting a Bill of Rights in the form of amendments to the Constitution, they were not attracted by the Secretary of War's proposals for "a strong corrective arm." Congress therefore rejected the Knox plan and Steuben's plan fell with it. Even the baron's modest little citizen army of 21,000 volunteers would have more "coercive power" than was popular just at that time.

On July 1, 1790, the Honorable Elias Boudinot, of New Jersey, introduced a new national-defense bill. In this bill he adopted an alternative solution of the militia problem that Washington had suggested in his Sentiments on a Peace Establishment. It was now proposed that the necessary peace training and organization should be provided by grouping all the younger men in a special "light infantry company" to be formed in each regiment of the general militia. Upon threat of war, these special light companies could be assembled into battalions and regiments and thus form the new Continental Army. Similar arrangements were proposed for the other branches of the service. The bill also provided for Federal supervision and for a sound system of discipline. This solution was not so simple as Steuben's, but it seemed to be free from political objection. And, after all, it still retained the essential principle of Washington's "well-regulated militia"; that is, the separate organization and training of a sufficient portion of the younger men in time of peace.

There was no time for action on the Boudinot bill in the First Congress. In the first session of the Second Congress substantially the same bill was introduced by the Honorable Jeremiah Wadsworth, of Connecticut. After some changes in the Committee of the Whole, the Wadsworth bill came up in the House on March 5, 1792. On that day every valuable provision in the bill was cut out by amendment. Washington's fundamental principle of separate organization and training for the younger men was eliminated. No provision for training of any kind remained in the bill. The bill as amended made no provision at all for Washington's "well-regulated" militia. The next day the amended bill passed the House as the worthless Militia Act of 1792.

Mr. Wadsworth, the sponsor of the bill, was so disgusted that he voted "no" on its final passage. And he might well be disgusted. If he had been able to pass the original Wadsworth bill of 1792, it would not have been necessary for his great-great-grandnephew, JAMES W. WADSWORTH, to pass the National Defense Act of 1920.

The reasons for this collapse of Washington's military program may be summarized briefly. When the Wadsworth bill came before the House, it became involved in the political struggle between the followers of Jefferson and the followers of Hamilton. The Jeffersonians were not disposed to give effective military power to a Government so strongly influenced by Alexander Hamilton. But the leaders of the new democracy kept their party record clear. They did not vote against the militia bill. They skillfully denatured it and then passed it.

Washington was greatly disappointed. But he finally signed the bill. He was always reluctant to use his veto power, and he hoped that the militia law could be amended later. In every subsequent message to Congress he still urged the establishment of a "well-regulated militia" as the only sound basis for national defense.

The Militia Act of 1792 was completely discredited in the War of 1812 and for many years this discredit attached to the whole conception of citizen soldiers as a sound basis for national defense. But there was nothing in the history of that war that impugns a "well-regulated militia" as Washington conceived it. If Steuben's plan had been adopted in 1784 we should have had an organized Continental Army of 50,000 men in 1812 with 50,000 trained reserves behind them. With such a force the administration's plan for the conquest of Canada could not have been a failure.

After the War of 1812 President Madison urged a return to Washington's wisdom. He was one of the last survivors of the original fathers of the Republic. He retained the merits of Washington's plan in his own memory. But his plea was disregarded. A few years later a new military gospel emanated from the War Department. This was officially proposed by John C. Calhoun, the Secretary of War, in 1820. It was now proposed to abandon our traditional citizen army and to rest our defense upon an expansible standing army.

This proposal was always absurd, because it is politically and economically impossible to exploit it to its logical conclusion in a country such as ours. If honestly worked out so as to assure a prompt and adequate war expansion, it calls for a regular peace establishment of prohibitive dimensions and expense. If worked out on the basis of a permissible peace establishment, it cannot meet the full demands of war expansion. But, unfortunately, this dangerous heresy became the accepted gospel of the Regular Army. During the ensuing century most Regular Army officers believed that preparedness was merely a question of increasing the Regular Army. They were never unanimous as to just how this increase should be made. For each of them believed that most of the increase should be applied to his own branch of the service. I worked out one of these Calhoun national-defense schemes when I was a second lieutenant. It led me to the conclusion that Congress should give us five more regiments of regular infantry. It happened incidentally that the same act of Congress would have made me a first lieutenant.

It is well known that Calhoun's political disciples in the South were the principal champions of secession, but it is not so well known that Calhoun's military disciples in the North almost made it impossible for Abraham Lincoln to save the Union. According to General Grant, the military superiority of the South in the early years of the war was due to the fact that the North did have and the South did not have a standing army. All of the trained officers and men in the South were immediately employed in organizing and training a citizen army. During this same time the North was wasting much more substantial resources of the same kind in a piddling little increase of the Regular Army. According to Grant, the Government should have disbanded the Regular Army and should have sent out its trained officers and men to leaven the new Volunteer Army.

Those who question the value of citizen soldiers should consider that superb army of the Confederacy. Every man in it was a citizen soldier. It was precisely the kind of an army that Washington recommended to his countrymen. But he would have made it even more formidable by giving it organization and training in time of peace. But could there have been an appeal to force in 1861 if Washington's Nation-wide organization had been adopted? For every organized regiment in the South there would have been four organized regiments in the rest of the Union. Could there have been an appeal to arms against such organized odds as these? In these circumstances there must have been a peaceful settlement of the slavery question.

In 1878, 13 years after the Civil War, Congress appointed a joint committee to reorganize our national defense system. Three of its seven members were Senators, the other four were Members of the House. All of them were distinguished veterans of the Civil War—five from the Union Army and two from the Confederate Army. This committee was called the "Burnside Commission", after its chairman, General Burnside, who was then a Senator from Rhode Island. It would be difficult to imagine a jury more amply qualified to pass on national military policy.

Just at this time General Upton was making his researches in Washington's writings. If he had found Washington's military policy and had brought it to the Burnside Commission, we should probably have had a sound military organization a whole generation before the World War. But, unfortunately, General Upton found none of Washington's constructive proposals. What he did find he used in support of his own thesis in behalf of an expansible standing army. Indeed, he had frankly undertaken his researches in order to find support for that thesis. The final result was remarkable. General Upton made Washington his principal witness in behalf of a doctrine that Washington never heard of and one that is repugnant to everything that Washington ever advocated.

If the Burnside Commission failed to receive Washington's military gospel, it did receive the orthodox gospel of the War Department. General Sherman, then the commanding general, presented the commission with his own pet version of the expansible standing army. This failed to impress the soldier statesmen of the commission, and so the solution of our national-defense problem was again deferred to the future.

After the Spanish-American War there was a new agitation for preparedness. This finally resulted in an increase of the Regular Army, but with no important step toward effective national organization.

In 1903, however, the General Staff Corps was established by Congress. Here for the first time in our history an agency was set apart to make comprehensive plans for the national defense. In ordinary circumstances this new scientific agency should have first investigated the history of our military institutions. This must have led at once to the rediscovery of Washington's original plan of 1783 and the perfected version of it prepared by Steuben in 1784.

But this interesting investigation was not undertaken. Just at that time General Upton's unprinted manuscript was rediscovered. It was accepted at once as an authoritative treatise on military policy, based on exhaustive historical research, and was published by the War Department as an official document. It was therefore no longer necessary for the infant General Staff to receive its baptism at the hands of Washington. The field of historical research had already been exhausted.

But as time went on, many thoughtful Army officers began to question that Calhoun-Upton doctrine. In 1911, I was a member of a general staff committee appointed by Secretary of War Stimson to propose a national-defense organization. The report of this committee was published by order of the Secretary of War in 1912. At the beginning of our report we said:

"It is the traditional policy of the United States that the military establishment in time of peace is to be a small Regular Army, and that the ultimate war force of the Nation is to be a great Army of citizen soldiers. * * * It is, therefore, our most important military problem to devise means for providing great armies of citizen soldiers to meet the emergency of modern war."

The organization we proposed was based upon the passage I have just read. In essentials it was similar to our present organization. If it had been adopted in 1912, we should have had an effective start toward organization for the World War.

Here was a step in the right direction. But when the World War broke out and there was a growing popular demand for preparedness, the General Staff returned to Calhoun and Upton. Their proposals resulted in the act of 1916. This gave us an elaborate military organization that had to be entirely revamped less than a year later, when we finally went into the World War. This law did give us a big increase in the Regular Army, with the result that we repeated the folly of 1861. We employed, in raising new regular regiments, many trained officers and men who should have been sent to the new divisions of the National Guard and the National Army.

After the armistice it became apparent that Congress would find it necessary to take up the whole problem of national military organization. General Pershing was ordered to send an officer from France who could represent his views. He selected me, but when I reported to him, he declined to give me any specific instructions. He had had no time to study this question carefully and his views had not been invited by the Government. In this way I returned to General Staff duty in Washington, and was assigned to the War Plans Branch where I had served before the war. The prospect was most encouraging. At last we were on the eve of securing a settled military policy.

But soon after my arrival in Washington I found that the question of military organization was already settled. The War Department had submitted a military bill to Congress. It was now officially decided that our traditional citizen army should be abandoned and that our security should rest upon an expansible standing army with a peace establishment of more than half a million men. Here was the Calhoun-Upton military policy carried out to the reductio ad absurdum.

This was a remarkable situation. I was convinced that this scheme was unsound in principle. I knew that its cost would be prohibitive. I knew that the war veterans, now returning to civil life, were prepared to support a sound military policy. I knew that they would oppose this official plan with all the power that they could organize. There was not the slightest prospect of its acceptance by Congress. Most of my immediate associates on the General Staff agreed with me that the War Department bill was thoroughly unsound.

While this situation was still electric in the air, I happened to attend a public meeting at the Willard Hotel in Washington. Among the gentlemen at the speaker's table was a vigorous young athlete who, much to my surprise, was introduced a little later as Senator JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Chairman of the Senate Military Committee. I had heard of the Senator many times and hoped to see him some day. But I had expected to see him with the snowy locks and the portly figure that usually go with a chairmanship in the Senate.

The Senator got right down to business. He wasted no time in oratory. He said that Congress was determined to establish a sound military system. He said that his committee was seeking advice on this important question. They expected to examine witnesses from all walks of life who had had war experience; Regular officers, emergency officers, and civilians. He said that they wanted witnesses who would give their frank and honest personal opinions instead of merely echoing the opinions of other people. He was very much in earnest. He impressed me at once as one of those rare individuals who really want facts, who are able to recognize facts when they see them, and who know how to use facts when they get them. I remember saying to myself, "If that man ever asks me for my opinion, I will tell him exactly what I think 'without partiality, favor, or affection.'"

When I finally appeared before Senator WADSWORTH's committee, my role was a very modest one. I was simply a long-belated messenger from Washington to Congress, bearing with me a twentieth-century adaptation of his original military policy. I knew that the foundations of my plan were erected upon Washington's wisdom. But I did not know then that, in the plan itself, I was really a plagiarist. I did not know until 8 years later that the plan I proposed to Senator WADSWORTH and his associates, was identical, in all essentials, with the Steuben plan that Washington approved in 1784. I had arrived at the same goal by another route. For many years, I had pondered on the practical application of Washington's general proposals. Finally I arrived, independently and unwittingly, at the same solution that Steuben reached after personal consultation with Washington himself. (As a partial amends for this unintentional plagiarism General Palmer is now (1935) writing the biography of Baron von Steuben.)

In order to grasp the full intent of the National Defense Act, it is necessary to understand how the law was finally written by conferees from the two Houses of Congress. In the Wadsworth bill as it passed the Senate all of the constructive features of our present military organization were described in a clear and logical manner. But there was no provision for any of these features in the Army bill just passed by the House of Representatives. This finally brought two widely divergent measures before a conference committee.

Here was a serious problem for Senator WADSWORTH. Fortunately the House conferees were favorably impressed by his presentation of the Washington military policy. They all agreed that our defense should rest upon our traditional citizen Army and not upon an expansible standing Army. But Congress was on the eve of adjournment and there would be no time for further debate or deliberation in the House.

It was then proposed that the Senate's organizational structure might be described in general terms in a few brief amendments to the House bill, leaving details of organization to the discretion of the President.

But here was a serious practical difficulty. Who would actually exercise the Presidential discretion? The President would necessarily delegate this task to the War Department, and the War Department, at that time, was committed to the expansible standing army bill that Congress had just rejected. Evidently, there must be some check on the President's discretion. Otherwise, without knowing it, he might intrust the practical application of Washington's military policy to the disciples of General Upton.

A practical solution for this difficulty was found in another provision of the Wadsworth bill. There, it was proposed that the organization of the new Army of the United States, with its Regular Army, its National Guard, and its Organized Reserves, should be made by General Staff committees in which citizen Army officers should have an equal voice with Regular Army officers.

This provision was accepted by the conferees and was embodied in the National Defense Act. Under the terms of this provision, the new organization was actually made soon after the passage of the law. It is, of course, an obvious implication from the general purpose of the law that modifications of the organizational structure should be made in the same way.

When Washington approved Steuben's plan he was especially impressed by its flexibility. In his letter to the baron he pointed out that, with the principles once established, the organizational structure could be "enlarged or diminished according to circumstances." His words were prophetic. He proposed to apply the plan when our country was a mere fringe along the Atlantic seaboard and our population less than 4,000,000. We have seen it applied in a great continental area with a population of 130,000,000 souls.

There will be modifications of the structure in the future; modifications to meet changes in the world situation, changes in methods of warfare, and changes in military weapons. But the Army of the United States, under the law, will always be an organized team of professional soldiers and citizen soldiers. As time goes on, the proper relative proportions of these two human elements can always be determined by applying two simple principles which flow inevitably from Washington's military policy:

1. We should maintain regular officers and soldiers to do those things that obviously cannot be done by citizen officers and soldiers.

2. We should not maintain regular officers and soldiers to do things that can be done effectively by citizen officers and soldiers.

These two principles are axiomatic. Whenever we depart from them we increase the cost of the Military Establishment unnecessarily and, at the same time, reduce our ultimate capacity for national defense. If we apply them intelligently in the future the National Defense Act of 1920 will meet our military needs, so long as we remain the Nation of free men that Washington, under the providence of God, was sent to establish.

THE RECOVERY OF THE NATIONAL BANKING SYSTEM

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by inserting a report from the Comptroller of the Currency relative to the assets of closed banks and other information as to real-estate assets.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, as I stated yesterday on the floor of the House when I asked leave to extend my remarks, I did so for the purpose of more particularly giving in detail to the country the wonderful and effective accomplishments of the Honorable J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency, since he took office in March 1933 under the most trying conditions that have ever confronted a Comptroller of the Currency.

The press release issued by the Comptroller of the Currency, on August 17, 1935, reveals deposits in 5,431 active national banks aggregating $22,518,541,000, as of June 29, 1935. This represents an increase since June 30, 1933, of $5,744,426,000, and establishes a record which has never been approached in the history of the national banking system. The total deposits in active national banks is now fast approaching the total reported for December 31, 1928, on which date 7,635 active national banks reported deposits aggregating $24,347,380,000. This was the highest total reported in the history of the system and exceeds the present figures by only $1,828,839,000.

The phenomenal recovery of the national banks may be attributed to the splendid work of rehabilitation instituted by the President immediately upon his assuming office. The master stroke of the Chief Executive in cleaning up the wreckage at the outset and the measures enacted by the Congress made possible the establishment of the banks on a sound basis and the restoration of the confidence of the public in their solvency.

The man directly responsible for this most remarkable record of recovery was the able, efficient, and energetic Comptroller of the Currency from California. Under his forceful direction seemingly impossible results were accomplished, reflecting credit not only upon himself and his Bureau but upon the administration and the Nation as well.

At the end of the banking holidays in March 1933 three major problems confronted the Comptroller of the Currency. The first of these was that of reopening 1,417 closed banks which had deposits aggregating approximately $2,000,000,000. The Comptroller now reports that all of these banks have been reopened or otherwise disposed of and that there is not a single national bank in conservatorship today. There were reopened under old or new charters or absorbed by other national banks 1,096 of these unlicensed banks, with deposits at closing aggregating $1,808,060,000; 31, with deposits of $11,513,000, either went into voluntary liquidation for the purpose of discontinuing operations or left the System; and 290, with deposits of $152,387,000, were placed in receivership after plans for reopening had been disapproved. The results of the work of the program of reopening unlicensed banks by the Comptroller of the Currency may be summarized by the statement that on March 31 of this year all but 25.6 percent of the total deposits involved in these 1,417 banks at closing had been returned to depositors.

The second problem confronting Mr. O'Connor following the banking holidays was that of returning to depositors of national banks in receivership every dollar possible with a minimum of delay. The results accomplished with the aid of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have been remarkable. Distributions to depositors in receivership banks since March 16, 1933, aggregate $674,332,605. There are now in receivership, under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency, 1,467 banks, which includes those banks placed in receivership prior to March 16, 1933, as well as those placed in receivership since that date. Deposits in these banks at closing aggregated $1,855,232,900, while $1,052,163,159, or more than 56 percent of the amount involved at closing, has been returned to depositors.

The Comptroller had as a third problem the task of rehabilitating and strengthening the capital structure of the banks under his supervision. Since March 16, 1933, 2,216 national banks have issued $542,296,800 in preferred stock and 273 have issued $43,357,500 in common stock for the purpose of repairing and strengthening their capital structure.

As these plans for taking care of the problems confronting him at the end of the banking holidays neared completion, the Comptroller was not unmindful of his obligations to the taxpayer and the unfortunate depositors to reduce expenses of his Bureau as rapidly as he could. Accordingly, the number of employees in the Comptroller's office was reduced from a peak of 791 on August 31, 1933, to 596 on July 1, 1935, and the personnel engaged outside the office in the liquidation of insolvent national banks has been reduced similarly. As rapidly as the stage of liquidation and other conditions permit, receiverships are consolidated and the number of receivers reduced. While there are 1,467 banks in liquidation under the supervision of the Comptroller, there are only 680 receivers in charge of these banks.

It has been the aim of the Comptroller to handle the liquidation of insolvent banks at the least possible cost to the unfortunate depositor and with a maximum of efficiency. The cost of liquidation, including administrative expenses, receivers' salaries, attorneys' fees, and all other items of expense in connection with the winding up of the affairs of an insolvent national bank, averages 7 percent of funds collected. In other words, an average of 93 cents out of every dollar collected is returned to the creditors of insolvent national banks.

Mr. O'Connor has not confined his activities to the work of the office of Comptroller of the Currency but has faithfully discharged his responsibility as an ex officio member of the Federal Reserve Board, and has played a major role in the organization and development of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Under provisions of the Banking Act of 1933 the Comptroller of the Currency was named an ex-officio member of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation Board. The two appointive members of the Board, Mr. Cummings, of Chicago, and Mr. Bennett, of Utah, did not take their oath of office until September 11, 1933. During the interim between the passage of the law and the organization of the Board, it was necessary to lay the foundation for the organization of the Corporation in order that provision might be made for the examination of over 8,000 State institutions before January 1, 1934.

Mr. O'Connor was the man who laid the foundation for the organization, who made plans for and set in motion examination of the State nonmember banks which became members of the fund on January 1, 1934. It was a stupendous task which he undertook and one which few believed he could complete in the short time allowed, but with the cooperation of Chairman Cummings and Director Bennett, the task was completed. The assets of all of the more than 8,000 nonmember banks were appraised in due time and the Corporation was organized and set to go on January 1, 1934, as provided by law.

These are indeed wonderful achievements on the part of the Comptroller of the Currency and not only he but the country is to be congratulated upon his accomplishments. I hope that in the future, men rendering like effective and constructive service will be recognized and appreciated and due credit given to encourage others to emulate honesty and efficiency in public office.

TAXATION

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by printing a speech made by the president of the Chamber of Commerce of New York City on economic questions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include the speech of Thomas I. Parkinson, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York.

This is one of the best speeches on the tax and economic situations even delivered before that chamber, and it was received with tremendous applause by the large number of members present.

The speech of Mr. Parkinson is as follows:

Unless there is objection, the call will be made part of the minutes of this meeting. The Chair hears no objection. The minutes will contain the call of the special meeting, which, under the bylaws of the chamber, can consider only the subjects referred to in the call. That being the purpose of this meeting, your officers feel not that they need to apologize to you for asking you to convene in midsummer in this hot weather, but to say a word in explanation of the reasons which inspired their decision to call the meeting.

The general subject of taxation is one about which the average taxpayer—and soon the people of this country will realize that that is the average run of people in the country—has no difficulty getting a bit hot under the collar even in ordinary weather, to say nothing of such weather as that in which we are convening. We called this meeting of representative businessmen who constitute the membership of this chamber, that we might consider whether there is anything we can do to help those charged with public responsibility in handling the fiscal problems which confront the Federal Government and especially anything which we businessmen and taxpayers can do to help those charged with public responsibility in dealing with such tax measures as that now pending in the conference of the Senate and House of Representatives today—a strange tax measure with little or no precedent in the history of legislation in this country, unless we are to include the recent history of Louisiana; a tax measure which had its origin in an executive message to the Congress which presented no budgetary reason for the new tax legislation, which dealt only in fundamental questions of governmental policy and the relationship of the Government to the individual. And upon that general message the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, contrary to all its precedents in the consideration and evolution of tax proposals, gave only a short hearing and gave even less consideration before recommendation and passage by the House.

In the Senate the procedure was likewise unusual. Look back over the history of this country and you will find that one of our great contributions to parliamentary government has been the committee system in our legislature, and particularly in our Federal Congress; the committee before which those interested have full opportunity to argue the pros and cons of a proposal; the committee in which, after those interested have been heard, has and takes the time to consider the facts and the meaning and effect of the proposed measures.

Look at the proceedings on this tax proposal and you will find nothing like that usual procedure in important tax measures—hurried hearings, a report which does not even attempt to set forth any justifying reasons for the committee's recommendations, the barest reference to the fact that the President has asked it in his general message, an apologetic reference with respect to almost every recommendation made by the Ways and Means Committee in place of the usual statement of facts and reasons for its recommendations.

And again in the Senate—a short hearing, no time for consideration, and a report which again does not even attempt to justify the recommendations which are made nor the provisions of the bill which is reported for action by the Senate. And those bills, developed in that way, have been passed by your House of Representatives and by your Senate.

May I take an illustration from a bill with which I am familiar? There was in that House bill, passed by the House of Representatives, a provision which made it impossible for us life-insurance companies to have paid maturing policies until months after the death of the insured. Today 95 percent of the claims on matured life-insurance policies are paid within 24 hours after presentation of the proofs. Under that bill as it passed the House and is in conference we could not pay beneficiaries under such a policy until we knew how much the beneficiary was to receive from the estate of the deceased insured in toto, and what would be the rate of payment on his whole beneficial interest received from the deceased insured; and if we did, we might have to pay over again to someone else the tax which was finally levied upon that portion of the beneficiary's estate which he received from the insurance policy.

Now, I know that Members of Congress did not mean to put such a provision on the statute books of this country. I know that the Congressmen from this metropolitan area did not mean to vote that the funds of widows and orphans that the insurer was ready to pay could not be made available for their purposes until months or years after the death of the insured. They did not only mean it but they did not know. They passed that bill without knowing what was in it. That is but one illustration of many provisions in that bill which they passed without knowing.

Is that representation of the taxpayers? Is that representation of the average run of people who are the constituents of the Congressmen? Gentlemen, I do not want to be extreme, but this country had its beginning in a little fracas known to history as the Boston Tea Party, and that, in turn, was inspired by objection to taxation without representation. And I submit that representation means intelligent observation of the facts, intelligent consideration of the facts and of proposals, and without the time necessary for such consideration there is no representation, and we are again faced with the danger of taxation without intelligent and effective representation. [Applause.]

May I read a word from that great source of political wisdom, the Federalist, in which Hamilton said: "There is no part of the administration of government that requires extensive information and a thorough knowledge of the principles of political economy so much as the business of taxation. The man who understands these principles best will be least likely to resort to oppressive expedients or to sacrifice any particular class of citizens to the procurement of revenue. There can be no doubt that in order to use a judicious exercise of the power of taxation it is necessary that the person in whose hands it is should be acquainted with the general habits and modes of thinking of the people at large and with resources of the country."

That is a fine bit of advice for anyone charged with public responsibility who undertakes to exercise this great power, this power which Chief Justice Marshall once said is a power to destroy. "The power to tax is the power to destroy." But the great Chief Justice did not utter that as an invitation to destructive use of the power of taxation. He uttered it as a warning. He never conceived of it in terms of taxation which would destroy not only the subject of the tax but even destroy the taxpayer himself.

Now, gentlemen, it is because both the proposals which form the basis of these pending tax bills which are scheduled to come out of conference in some form in the next few days, and because the provisions of those bills themselves violate all true principles of taxation, because they have been conceived, developed, and enacted with a haste and recklessness contrary to all our legislative, and particularly our revenue-legislative, history; it is because of those factors involved in this legislation that we have asked you to come together, to see whether you, this organization, which is yours to use to effect your purposes, can do something to bring about a more careful consideration of every measure, fiscal or tax, which is brought forward in these troublesome times for the solution of the financial problems of the Federal Government.

We have been drifting into a situation where the easy-going methods which have characterized the evolution of this pending tax bill will be likely to suggest other and even more dangerous experiments to solve our more important problems. I do not want to bore you with figures. It is enough to say that the Federal, State, and local bonded debt in this country forms a blanket of $50,000,000,000 of first lien on all the property and property values of this country. As the pressure of that vast debt becomes greater the same easy-going and political solution which has characterized the consideration of this tax measure may very well resort to measures for dealing with that huge obligation in terms of confiscation, repudiation, or inflation, which is a little bit above confiscation and repudiation.

The problem is growing more serious daily, and if the easiest way is to be the way of solution, if the political way is to be the way of solution, as it has been in the consideration of this pending tax bill, then we are face to face, we who are responsible for the administration of business and the events of business, with the possibility of resort either through confiscatory taxation, to hitherto unthinkable repudiation, or to the easy, indirect, misrepresenting solution through inflation.

We know that there are limits to what you and I can do singly or in groups like this chamber of commerce, in the solution of problems, the details of which are so much in the hands of those who hold high public office and have the details at their command; but, gentlemen, is there not something that we can do? If not with respect to this particular tax bill, then to the solution of the fiscal and tax problems of this country in the near future, is there not something we can do which will assure us of a more responsible attitude on the part of our Congressmen, and a more intelligent consideration of any proposals which are before them?

Asking your pardon for even so much of a statement as that, I thought you ought to realize why at this time of the year and under all the circumstances we thought that we should grant the request of those members who asked that a special meeting of the chamber should be called for the consideration of these questions. The main business of the meeting, then, is to hear the report of the committee on taxation, which in the absence of Mr. Lee, the chairman, will be presented by Mr. Merrill. Mr. Merrill. [Prolonged applause, with the audience rising.]

WAGE AND LIVING COST DIFFERENTIALS INVOLVED IN THE CONTRACTOR'S BILL, S. 3055

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a statement I made before the Committee on the Judiciary during the consideration of a pending bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my statement before the House Judiciary Committee, August 20, 1935, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. ZIMMERMAN, you are appearing in opposition to the bill, as I understand it?

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Give your name to the reporter and proceed, Mr. ZIMMERMAN.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. ORVILLE ZIMMERMAN, Representative Tenth District of Missouri, which comprises the southeast corner of the State of Missouri. My district is about 100 miles north of Memphis and about 150 miles south of the city of St. Louis.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, in view of the far-reaching scope of this bill, it would seem to me that this matter should not be rushed through this committee or through Congress, but that this subject and the matters proposed in this bill should be given close and extensive study, in order that the right thing may be done about the matters that are contained in this bill.

I want to say this: As a representative of rural Missouri and as a representative of a great many shoe and garment factories in my district, I should like to have the privilege and the opportunity of bringing witnesses here before this committee and give you men the real facts about that situation and a vivid picture of conditions which obtain in my district and in other districts in Missouri and adjoining States, in order that intelligent legislation may be enacted which will not be detrimental to certain sections of our country, particularly in the West and in the South.

So, gentlemen, what I shall say here today applies with equal force to the western manufacturer, the little manufacturer, and the small towns in the West and in the South. You have already heard something about the plight of the manufacturer in the South, and what is true of the South is true of the West, because the same conditions obtain in both sections of our country, and we are grouped in the same class.

Gentlemen, I urge that you give this bill your most earnest and careful consideration, and if possible give these people a chance to come here and present their case before legislation is enacted which I believe, and which a great many of us believe, will bar us from the privilege of pursuing our vocations as we have in the past.

Let me call your attention to this fact also: The purpose of the bill on its face is the reincarnation of the N. I. R. A., particularly with reference to the maximum hours and minimum wages. There can be no doubt about that; it is patent upon its face, and while, gentlemen, I am not going to attempt to argue the legal phases of this question, I do hope we will do this: I hope we will first give the Wagner labor disputes bill an opportunity to operate and demonstrate what it will do for labor with reference to minimum wages and maximum hours.

I do not hold myself out as a constitutional lawyer. We have a great abundance of that group in our Congress. I am just a plain country practitioner, and shall not pretend to argue the constitutional phases of the question.

A great many of us think that the Wagner bill gives labor an opportunity to bargain and to work out the proper standards of hours and of wages, and it seems to me that we ought to give that bill, which has been passed by this Congress and signed by the President, an opportunity to work and see what it will do and what effect it will have upon hours of work and wages.

For that reason it seems to me that the operation of that bill should be given a chance to work and should challenge this committee to proceed cautiously and slowly with the consideration of this bill, which has for its objectives the same purpose.

Now, gentlemen, as I said awhile ago, in my congressional district we have about 10 small factories. Most of these factories are shoe factories scattered over the principal towns in my district. These factories are subsidiaries of the larger factories in the city of St. Louis.

How did we get these factories? The truth about the matter is the people down in my agricultural district—and, by the way, I come from one of the finest agricultural districts in the whole country—felt the necessity and importance of providing some industrial opportunity for the labor in our towns and communities where this labor could not be absorbed in agricultural pursuits.

And so the citizens of these smaller towns went together and arranged with these larger shoe operators in the city of St. Louis, like the International Shoe Co. and the Brown Shoe Co., and others, to establish factories out in rural Missouri. That thing has happened all over the State of Missouri, in the State of Illinois, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and in other sections of the country. As a result of their efforts the citizens would get together and raise $50,000 or more and build a plant, in order to induce these large companies to establish branch factories in their particular towns.

As a result about five or six shoe factories have been established in my district, and they had been operating many years before the N. I. R. A. went into effect, and they operated successfully, because there was a natural and living cost differential which operated in favor of these small factories in these rural communities, and but for which they could not have operated.

Now, gentlemen, in the larger cities like Boston, New York, and the city of St. Louis, they have what we call the line operation. They have many mechanics, trained and skilled to man their machines when they get out of order. They have a surplus of skilled laborers, superintendents, etc. If one gets sick and drops out another can step in and take his place. If a machine breaks down they can substitute another and go ahead with the operation.

But down in these rural sections 100 or 150 miles from the larger center they do not have the mechanics, they do not have the skilled superintendents, nor do they have a surplus of machines; and, necessarily, when any mishap takes place, it means delay and it adds additional cost to the manufacture of shoes or of gloves or of overalls or of shirts in these communities.

There is another thing we have found out: We have learned from investigation that the freight rate, shipping the raw material from Memphis, Tenn., or from the city of St. Louis down to my section, adds an additional cost, and when the product is manufactured and ready for the market the additional freight charge back to the center for distribution adds more to the cost.

We have also found out that these operators could operate at a less wage in these rural communities than they could in the city of St. Louis or in the city of New York or any other large city, because the cost of living is cheaper. Down in these sections we find that the factory worker owns his home. He has a garden, where, after his factory hours, he goes out and raises his potatoes, sweet corn, beans, cabbage, and a large part of his living. In many instances they have a cow. Land is cheap enough that they can afford enough land to support their cow. They have their flock of chickens; they have their eggs, their butter, their milk, their garden truck, as we call it down in our country, which contributes a large part of their living.

And so these men can do this work in their factories, work in their gardens, and take care of their homes; and they make a good living. In fact, gentlemen, these men out in these rural communities live better than the man in the city who gets a larger wage, and for that reason the wage differential becomes a very material factor in the successful operation of these small factories in these communities.

The same thing is true of our garment factories. In my home town the Ely-Walker Dry Goods Co., in St. Louis, one of the largest in the country, established one of the largest rural factories in the State of Missouri. The citizens of my town, including your humble servant, put up about $50,000 to build an adequate plant in order to carry on this factory. It gives work to about 750 people, boys and girls in my county and community, when operated to capacity, and that was made possible because of the wage differential which I am going to talk to you about, and which has naturally grown up and obtained long before the N. I. R. A. went into effect—a natural differential based upon facts, and it was because of that wage differential that these factories were able to operate successfully and at a profit in these small towns, and without which these laborers would have had no employment.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. ZIMMERMAN, what effect did the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act have on the manufacturers in your district?

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. In my particular district I have letters from the garment factory in my home town. A gentleman who lived in the city of Memphis, and who has operated factories for years, told me that he was doubtful if they could operate much longer under the wage differential that was provided by the N. I. R. A.; that they were barely getting by, and if there was any material change, he did not see how they could proceed very much longer.

What would that mean to our community? Suppose that factory would close. It would mean that our citizens would have on their hands a $50,000 or $60,000 building, a complete loss to that community, and these 750 ambitious boys and girls coming from the farm would lose their jobs and have no place to go.

I will say this to the gentleman: At Kahoka, Mo.—which is up in my friend ROMJUE'S district—they had a shoe factory, but they were forced to a wage differential of only $1 per week and they were forced to close that plant down because they could not manufacture shoes at a profit but at a loss.

Senator WALSH. The differential, of course, was only on minimum wages, not on any wage scale at all.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. What about Washington, Mo., about 75 miles west of the city of St. Louis? They had been running at a loss for months, because the wage differential as allowed by the code was not enough to enable this company to operate that large plant, which accommodated nearly a thousand employees.

Let us take for example Joplin, Mo. A gentleman down there for years has been manufacturing ladies' handbags, one of the finest plants in our country, in fact the pride of our State. It never was allowed any wage differential whatsoever, and, gentlemen, I heard that man stand up and say that unless conditions changed they would be forced to close that plant, throw out of employment all those people in the little city of Joplin, and that plant, erected at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars, would be idle and useless and could not be used for any other purpose.

Now, gentlemen, it is this group of manufacturers that I want to plead for here today, because I say to you that if this bill is passed in its present form and the code differential of $1 per week for the shoe manufacturer obtains, I believe it will mean the ultimate ruin of every rural shoe manufacturer in my State and in the surrounding States.

And, gentlemen, that is not right. I want to give you a few facts and figures about that. Since the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Senator WALSH] made reference to the shoe business, we all know in this Congress that early this year shoe manufacturers in Boston came down to Washington en masse, held hearings before the Labor Committee to induce the code authorities to abolish the wage differential in the manufacture of shoes, and when the Missouri delegation and the Illinois delegation met the code authorities over here to discuss the situation, and after we gave them the facts, they conceded to us that the $1 wage differential provided by the code was not adequate.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Yes.

Mr. WALTER. What percentage of the business these manufacturers of your district do is done with the Government?

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Well, I can't answer that, but I am sure they will not be able to do any business with the Government if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. WALTER. Of course, your argument would apply if you were arguing against the extension of the N. R. A.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I want to touch on that a little later.

The CHAIRMAN. Well now, there isn't going to be much later.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Oh.

The CHAIRMAN. We are crowded for time, and you have already occupied 15 minutes.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I didn't think I had talked but about 5, Judge.

The CHAIRMAN. We didn't, either. We had to look at the watch to realize it.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I want to say this——

The CHAIRMAN. Wait just a minute.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Pardon me.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't want to crowd you out, but get to the most important facts you have to suggest.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. All right. Driving this point a little further, these gentlemen on the shoe and boot code said that a dollar was not enough—"you are entitled to a greater differential."

Senator WALSH. I understood there was just one shoe factory in this country that makes all the Government shoes for the Army and Navy. They carry out certain specifications and built their plant for that purpose, and there is no competition.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. And they have a chance to create the greatest monopoly in this country, as I will try to show you a little later. It opens the door to monopoly.

Gentlemen, a reading of section 3, on page 10, of the bill, subsection (1), and subsections (a) and (b) under (1) and subsections 2, 3, 4, 5, will disclose requirements which will deter the average business man from bidding on any Government contract, and in my humble opinion it opens the door to the greatest opportunity for companies to monopolize a field and chisel the Government, if you please, that you could have anywhere.

Now, I want to talk more about this wage differential; I want to give you the facts, gentlemen, as worked out by the research staff of the Industrial Club of St. Louis. A tabulation was made of 31 cities in the United States for the year 1933, showing the average cost of living in such cities, the index number being based on New York living cost as 100 percent. The average cost of living for the worker was found to range from $1,214 down to $914 per annum for a family of four. This calculation shows the cost of living, population, and relationship in terms of index numbers and dollars for the average wage-earner's family for the city of New York which has been taken as a hundred percent.

I would like at this point to file the following sheet as exhibit 1 to my statement (worked out by the research staff of the Industrial Club of St. Louis):

"Calculation enables us to bring up to June 1933 the cost-of-living statistics for the average wage-earner's family in the 31 cities for which the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics supplies semiannual cost-of-living-change figures. These June 1933 cost-of-living figures are listed below in table 'B', showing the cost of living, population, and relationship, in terms of index numbers and dollars, to the cost of living of the average wage-earner's family in the city of New York, which has been taken as 100 percent.

	Average, of 31 cities		91	1,057

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Taking that as a basis, worked out in the same manner, 16 towns in the State of Missouri and Illinois were worked out, showing population of the town, the percent, and average annual cost of living. Beginning with Hannibal, Mo., there are Belleville, Ill.; Decatur, Ill.; Springfield, Ill.; Danville, Ill.; Poplar Bluff, Mo., in my district; and Lebanon, Mo., a small town; and Vandalia, Mo., also a small town.

The average annual cost of living per family in these towns was $799, as compared with the average cost based on living expenses in New York, which was $1,166.

I cite these figures to show you the justice in the wage differential which should exist in favor of these towns. It is because of that wage differential that they can pay the difference in freight rate, shipping the raw material in and the manufactured product out, and the additional cost of manufacturing in these small towns, because these country boys and girls produce slowly. They cannot produce like the highly skilled city laborer, and the additional labor increases the cost.

Now, let us take as an illustration Lebanon, Mo. That is a little town of 3,562 people. The cost of living was 60 percent, as compared with New York, and the average annual cost of the worker in that town was $701, as compared with the cost in the larger cities.

Now I desire to offer the following sheet as exhibit 2 to my remarks:

"From table B it will be seen that St. Louis' own living cost is but 90 percent of that for the city of New York. We have taken the 16 towns and cities surveyed by the Industrial Bureau and placed them likewise in comparison with the New York cost of living. The tabulation below shows that the average for the 16 small cities and towns is but $799 per family per year, or 69 percent of the cost in New York.

TABLE C

Rank	City or town	1930 population	Percent	Average annual cost of living
1	Hannibal, Mo	22,761	77	$900
2	Belleville, Ill	28,425	77	894
3	Decatur, Ill	57,510	76	885
4	Springfield, Ill	71,864	75	876
5	Danville, Ill	36,765	75	870

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Now, gentlemen, in order to show you how carefully and scientifically they went into the cost of living in the little town of Lebanon, Mo., I would like to present to you a photostatic copy of one of the original work sheets which was used to get the information upon which to reach these results. I haven't time to go into that in detail, but I would like to offer this sheet. This deals with the cost of housing and of rentals, and I would like to file this sheet as exhibit 3 to my statement, as follows:

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Then the price of clothes is taken into consideration, what they pay for clothing down there in that town, and after careful investigation they calculated the retail prices of clothing for females on the following sheet, which gives you the cost of apparel for women workers, which I desire to offer as exhibit 5 to my statement, as follows:

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Then in order to get a proper understanding of the cost of living they made an investigation of the price of men's clothing and wearing apparel in that little city, and that was tabulated, and I offer exhibit 6 as illustrative of the cost of men's wearing apparel in that town, as follows:

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Gentlemen, these figures show conclusively that the cost of living in the town of Lebanon, Mo., taking it as an example, reflects the wide difference between the cost of living in the average large city as compared to the average country town. For that reason this wage differential should be maintained and must be maintained if these factories are to operate.

In conclusion—I should like 1 minute to conclude.

The CHAIRMAN. You have had 20. Go ahead; 1 more minute.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. All right. In conclusion, gentlemen, under this bill the same authorities that administered the N. I. R. A., selected from the large centers in New England and from other large cities in the North and East, will administer this bill; and, gentlemen, in my humble opinion and judgment, if this bill is enacted into law, with no provision for a wage differential, the little shoe factory, the little garment and glove factory in Missouri, Illinois, and other States over the South and Middle West will go out of business. Boston and other big cities will have the business, and our workers and their families will be on relief.

ESTABLISHMENT OF FURNITURE FACTORIES BY THE RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein correspondence between the Administrator of the Resettlement Administration and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, fearing that the imminence of the adjournment of this session of the Seventy-fourth Congress would prevent me from presenting to this Congress and to the country certain theories and desires of Rexford G. Tugwell, Administrator of the Resettlement Administration, which I consider subversive to the best interests of the American people, I have asked permission to publish certain correspondence between Mr. Tugwell and myself. It is interesting to note that Mr. Tugwell at this date has not replied to my letter of August 20.

JULY 29, 1935.

Mr. REXFORD G. TUGWELL,
Resettlement Administration,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TUGWELL: It has been called to my attention that your Administration is planning to build a number of furniture plants in various parts of the country as part of the resettlement project. These, I understand, are to be new plants with new equipment.

Please advise me within the next 3 days if this information is authentic. Certainly, you would not deny a Member of Congress this information, and for that reason will expect to receive some word from you within the above-stated time.

Very truly yours,

JOHN W. BOEHNE, Jr.

AUGUST 7, 1935.

Dr. REXFORD G. TUGWELL,
Resettlement Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. TUGWELL: On July 29 I wrote you a letter regarding the furniture plants to be built in various parts of the country as part of the resettlement project. Your office called me last week promising a reply not later than Monday, August 5. To date this has not been received. I would appreciate this information by August 10, as it is absolutely necessary that I give my constituents detailed information at a very early date.

Very truly yours,

JOHN W. BOEHNE, Jr.

AUGUST 14, 1935.

Dr. REXFORD G. TUGWELL,
Resettlement Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR DR. TUGWELL: On July 29, and again on August 7, I wrote you regarding the possibility of building furniture plants as part of the Resettlement Administration. In response to my first letter your office called my office advising me that an answer would be had by August 5. The answer was not received and I therefore caused another letter to be addressed to you, which to date remains unanswered.

I have any number of furniture factories in my district which have not been operating for a number of years; and it seems to me if furniture is needed in your resettlement work, these should be used before building any new plants.

I shall expect a full and complete reply to this letter in which I request that you give me all of the plans which have been formulated for the proposed new plants.

Very truly yours,

JOHN W. BOEHNE, Jr.

RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION

Hon. JOHN W. BOEHNE, Jr.,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BOEHNE: This letter will serve as an acknowledgment of your letter of August 7, and various telephone conversations with you and your office concerning information which you had received with reference to the construction by Resettlement Administration of furniture plants in various parts of the country.

You are receiving today a statement as to our policy. It is to be regretted this information has been delayed in getting to you.

Very sincerely yours,

R. G. TUGWELL, Administrator.

RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION,
OFFICE OF THE ADMINISTRATOR, Washington.

Hon. JOHN W. BOEHNE, Jr.,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BOEHNE: This will acknowledge your letter of July 29, concerning the information given you that this Administration is planning to build a number of furniture plants in various parts of the country.

It would appear that you have been misinformed concerning the policy of this Administration. Whatever furniture is manufactured in connection with any resettlement project will be made solely for the use of participants in our projects.

As the income of the people on these projects is not sufficient to permit them to purchase furniture in the ordinary way, and as none of the furniture will be sold in the open market, there need be no fear of Government competition.

Very sincerely yours,

R. G. TUGWELL, Administrator.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 15, 1935.

Dr. REXFORD G. TUGWELL,
Resettlement Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR DR. TUGWELL: This afternoon I finally received a reply to my letters addressed to you on July 29, August 7, and again on August 14. To say the least, your letter was extremely definite in one thing—namely, that the Resettlement Administration had decided to actually go into the furniture business, because you say, "Whatever furniture is manufactured in connection with any resettlement project will be made solely for the use of participants in our projects." Then you go on in your letter and make the very definite statement, "As the income of the people on these projects is not sufficient to permit them to purchase furniture in the ordinary way, and as none of the furniture will be sold in the open market, there need be no fear of Government competition."

This confirms the apprehension which I had that the Government was going farther into the field of private business, in spite of the fact that not only in my congressional district but all over the country several hundreds of furniture plants are idle, which could and should be used for the manufacture of furniture in your resettlement projects, and those plants should be worked to full capacity before the Government should even consider manufacturing on its own accord.

It seems to me that you have entirely forgotten the decisive vote of last year regarding the Reedsville, W. Va., project, where it was contemplated to manufacture post-office equipment. The people of this country will not countenance any further encroachment of the Government into the fields of business. With recovery in the air, with business improving, for goodness sake give business a chance to get ahead. You are not going to do it when you contemplate the manufacture of one bed or one single chair.

I therefore call upon you to issue orders canceling the manufacturing of furniture for your resettlement projects, and must give notice that if this is not done further action will be necessary, for which I know I will receive a vote of confidence in Congress.

Very truly yours,

JOHN W. BOEHNE, Jr.

RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION,
August 17, 1395.

Hon. JOHN W. BOEHNE, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOEHNE: This is in reply to your letter of August 15.

You are evidently under the impression that the Government will be engaged in making furniture in homestead communities. I do not know definitely how much will be made in these communities; but in any case it will not be a Government operation, but one carried on by the homesteaders themselves, with their own organization.

Their desire to do this, or to engage in other enterprises, seems to me a commendable instance of initiative. Do you not think that these people should be encouraged to develop this enterprising spirit which has traditionally characterized Americans?

Sincerely,

R. G. TUGWELL, Administrator.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 20, 1935.

R. G. TUGWELL,
Resettlement Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR DR. TUGWELL: Your letter of August 17 has been received and I have noticed in it a spirit of evasiveness, which is indeed not commendable. I certainly hope that your replies are not intentionally couched in language which would make any reader of them have the feeling that you do not desire to have the American people know exactly what you are doing, or what you propose to do. In order that there may not be any misunderstanding or misinterpretation of your intention and the intentions of the Resettlement Administration, I shall ask certain questions which I desire to have answered.

1. How many furniture factories does the Resettlement Administration intend to establish?

2. In the aggregate, how much money does the Resettlement Administration expect to put into these enterprises?

3. Who is going to buy the furniture produced in these plants, or will it be given away?

4. In a recent letter you say, "As the income of the people on these projects is not sufficient to permit them to purchase furniture in the ordinary way", then advise what wages will be paid to those working in such furniture plants?

5. Your letter of the 17th says, "It will not be a Government operation, but one carried on by the homesteaders themselves." The question is, Who is financing the operation?

6. Your letter of the 17th states, "Their desire to do this, or to engage in other enterprises, seems to me a commendable instance of initiative"; frankly and honestly, is it their desire to do this, or is it the desire of the Resettlement Administration?

7. Do you honestly believe that your proposition will encourage an enterprising spirit?

8. Will this increase the purchasing powers of the masses, particularly those employees in furniture factories now operating, who find the Government competing with them?

9. If your Administration will be permitted to grow, how soon will we reach the time when we cannot secure sufficient revenue to continue the un-American experiments which you propose?

This letter and other letters which I have addressed to you are not being sent as a publicity stunt. I am serious, and I propose going to the bottom of the entire affair. I propose to find out what your theories are, and having learned that, to do everything humanly possible to keep you from putting them into effect.

I am responsible to my constituents, because I was elected by them. You have no constituent responsibility, and in spite of what a few theorists may think this Government still belongs to all of the people and should be administered by its chosen representatives. I will expect a prompt reply to this letter with a detailed answer to each question.

Very truly yours,

JOHN W. BOEHNE, JR.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. DELGADO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech of Mr. M. L. Quezon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands?

There was no objection.

Mr. DELGADO. Mr. Speaker, on the eve of the inauguration of the Commonwealth Government of the Philippine Islands there are speculations all around on what is going to be the fate of the newest nation to be launched in the Pacific. What lot is going to be ours no one can tell in certain terms just now. I am one of those who sincerely and firmly believe that under divine guidance our people will succeed.

However, I hope you are interested to know the spirit and solemn sense of responsibility in which our people are taking over the affairs of their Government. I have here a copy of the acceptance speech of the Hon. Manuel L. Quezon, president of the Philippine Senate, and outstanding candidate for the presidency of the commonwealth government, delivered at Manila, P. I., on Friday, July 19, 1935, which expresses and typifies that spirit, and enunciates what will most likely be the guiding policies of the new government soon to be inaugurated. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include said acceptance speech of Mr. Quezon, which is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen of the committee, fellow citizens, a party nomination for the highest office within the gift of the people is in itself a great distinction, but when the nomination comes under such auspicious circumstances as have attended that which is now proffered to me, I regard it as the greatest honor that can be accorded to any public man short alone of his actual election to the Presidency.

COMMONWEALTH RESPONSIBILITIES

Ever since the approval and acceptance of the independence act there has been growing among the people a feeling of deepest concern over the difficult problems and impending responsibilities which will confront us upon the inauguration of the Commonwealth.

While the constitutional convention was in session, partly fostered by the spirit of national solidarity exhibited by the members of that body, the anxiety to prepare the country adequately to meet these problems and responsibilities became articulate in an increasingly popular demand for national unity, that political parties gave pause to partisan strife, that the leaders of the vital forces of the Nation join in their efforts for the attainment of the common goal, and that the entire country resolve to support loyaly the man who may be intrusted with the national leadership so that through the government of the commonwealth the foundations of the future Philippine republic may be solidly and firmly established. Resolutions were passed by municipal councils as well as by civic and social organizations, including labor unions, demanding a coalition of the two great political partes as the most practical means of obtaining this unity of effort.

Before the constitutional convention adjourned the cry of national unity was taken up by the League of Provincial Governors. Without regard to party affiliation and voicing the prevailing sentiment in the respective provinces, these spokesmen of our local governments unanimously joined in the general appeal for unity. Lastly, prominent Filipino businessmen, professionals, and leaders in agriculture, industry, and labor formally submitted to the directorate of the two political parties a concrete proposal that the two parties nominate jointly the candidates for President and Vice President and thus insure the cooperation of all the vital forces of the Nation during the first and trying years of the commonwealth. When the two parties held their respective national conventions they readily responded to this popular clamor and forthwith agreed to form a coalition and to nominate the same candidates for President and Vice President.

NOMINATIONS UNSOUGHT

Neither Senator Osmena nor I sought these nominations. We made no pre-convention campaign, nor did we have any desire to secure them. We entered public life about the same time 30 years ago, both pledged to the cause of independence. The vicissitudes which have been our lot during these years are not now to be recounted, but as I look back upon our joint efforts in the attainment of the goal which we set out before us, I feel happy that at the end of the long struggle we can face our people standing on the same platform, our pledge fulfilled, our mutual friendship and regard enhanced, and still enjoying, I hope, their continued confidence and support.

With the approval of the Independence Act and its acceptance by the country we believed that our extended public service could at last come to an end. We would have been content as private citizens to lend our unstinted support to the new government.

But it seems that our fellow citizens have once again chosen to place upon our shoulders the new responsibility of organizing the commonwealth and leading the Nation during the early years of its existence. The nomination that has been proferred to us attains the category of a call to duty which no public-spirited citizen may evade or disregard. I, therefore, Mr. Chairman, make public announcement that I accept the nomination for the Presidency which has been tendered to me, deeming it my bounden duty to do so, and I accept it with the most profound sense of the responsibility that it entails and the deepest feeling of gratitude.

Having been nominated under the circumstances I have mentioned, I cannot afford to speak in uncertain terms. The need of the hour is for fixed orientation, clear statement of policies, and a definition of the national purposes. In the course of the present campaign I shall have opportunity to discuss all the important questions before the country. For the present I have to limit myself to a few of them.

THE PLATFORM

The coalition platform meets with my whole-hearted approval. I took part in the drafting of that document, and I make my own every commitment contained therein.

THE CONSTITUTION

I look upon the constitution of the Philippines as the expression of the sovereignty and of the aggregate will of the Filipino people. I shall abide by its provisions. I shall uphold the democratic principle underlying the institutions that it establishes. I am opposed to a dictatorship. I maintain that no man who believes in a dictatorship can with safety be intrusted with the reins of executive power under our constitution. Democracy can only survive if those at the helm of the government believe in the people's right to rule and have faith in their inherent capacity to decide rightly important public questions.

I will hold inviolate, and will defend to the utmost, the individual rights and liberties. I shall safeguard free speech, the freedom of the press, and the equality of every man before the law, however poor or ignorant. I shall insure for every citizen of the Philippines, from Luzon to Mindanao and Sulu, the right to worship God as his own conscience dictates.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE COMMONWEALTH

We are entering a new era. We are on the threshold of free nationhood. The government of the commonwealth that we shall establish derives its powers from a constitution approved by the people themselves. It may truly be said that it is a government of our creation to be administered for our own welfare.

Except in a few specified cases, it will be free from American control in the conduct of domestic affairs. Only in our foreign relations do we remain subject to American supervision, and this because of the continuing responsibility of the United States to protect and defend the islands from foreign aggression during the life of the commonwealth. Hence, the government of the commonwealth will be, in fact, if not in name, an independent government under the protection of the United States.

The immediate task before us is to set up the new government—a task that will require all the foresight, the wisdom, and the courage of our people. Then we must adopt such measures as will insure the stability of our national economy, and provide for the honest and efficient administration of the affairs of government. Equally important is to make adequate provision for the defense of our country against external aggression or internal disorders.

I favor a simple and economical government, one in keeping with the limited resources of our country, but which is capable of ministering to the needs of the nation.

I shall be unsparing in my efforts to carry out the mandate of the constitution regarding the civil service. Merit and character alone will be the qualification for office or promotion. For the highest responsible posts I shall call on the most capable, honest, and patriotic citizens, regardless of political affiliation or religious belief. This is no time for placing party considerations above the common weal. In fact, one of the main purposes of the coalition is to secure the cooperation and help of the best available men to insure the success of the commonwealth. I shall tolerate neither corruption nor inefficiency in public office.

FINANCIAL POLICY

The financial stability of the government depends upon our ability to keep expenses within our income. At the time when other governments are resorting to loans in order to meet their obligations we can take pride in the fact that we have been able to maintain a balanced budget. Under our constitution the responsibility for maintaining a balanced budget falls mainly upon the executive. I pledge myself to maintain the credit of the government and at all times to balance the budget and keep our finances in a sound condition.

I shall keep our present currency system in all its integrity and will allow no change that will affect its value. If new conditions should require such a change, it will be done only after the most careful study and consultation with competent experts. For the present I can see no reason for any radical modification in our monetary system.

TAXATION

Irresponsible demagogues have tried to arouse in the hearts of our people the hope that under an independent Philippines there shall be no taxes except upon the rich. It is my duty to warn the credulous against such misrepresentation. Governments can be supported only through taxation. It is a primary duty of citizens to contribute to the support of the government, but taxation that does not take into consideration the relative financial ability of the taxpayer is unjust. I favor a complete revision of our system of taxation with the best technical advice available. I advocate that the burdens of the state be equitably distributed in proportion to the means and possibilities of the taxpayer. We shall make a general reduction of the assessed value of real property in accordance with present prices.

PUBLIC WORKS

The so-called "pork barrel" system, as known in the United States and as sometimes practiced in the Philippines, must definitely be discarded. It is a waste of public funds. I am in favor of continuing the building of roads and schools, in accordance with a carefully prepared plan to be followed systematically, in the order of their relative importance to the general public.

PUBLIC INSTRUCTION

I stand by the educational policy enunciated in the constitution. The principle underlying this policy is the training for useful, well-disciplined, self-sacrificing citizenship that draws its breath of life from Filipino patriotism. Our system of education should be revised so as to accomplish that aim still more effectively. The State is in duty bound to maintain a complete and adequate system of public education, providing at least free public primary instruction and citizenship training to adult citizens.

My attention will be especially devoted to making it possible for every child to go to school. Adult citizenship training will be carried out in accordance with a broad and systematic plan. To the end that poverty may not prevent gifted young men and women from developing their talent, the government should create the largest possible number of scholarships for them in all branches of learning. Our educational objective should fit in with our economic policy. I am for greater emphasis on vocational and agricultural training in the intermediate and high schools, but the instruction should always be in keeping with the economic conditions of each region and of the country as a whole.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

An independent judiciary, administering justice without fear or favor, promptly and impartially to rich and poor alike is the strongest bulwark of individual rights and the best guaranty against oppression and usurpation from any source. Equally important is the maintenance of the confidence of the people in the courts. I will appoint no man to the bench without having satisfied myself, after a thorough investigation, of his character and ability.

To strengthen the faith of the common people to our courts it is necessary that the utmost care be exerted in the selection of justices of the peace. These courts are often the only tribunals accessible to the larger portion of our population, and it is essential that they be maintained worthy of their confidence. If the disinherited cannot obtain redress of their grievances or vindication of their rights in these courts, they have no further recourse, for the courts of first instance and the supreme court are often beyond their reach. By the impartiality and integrity of the justices of the peace, therefore, the judiciary of the Philippines is judged by the millions of our countrymen who live in the barrios and distant places. I pledge myself to do everything in my power to maintain these courts free from political or other extraneous influence and to appoint thereto only men of proven ability and integrity and of the broadest human sympathies.

SOCIAL PROBLEMS

The welfare of the people should be the concern of the Government. The helpless and the needy, the jobless, as well as the workers in the factories and in the field have a claim upon the Government to safeguard their health and well-being. The contentment of the masses is the first insurance against social and political disorders. It is the duty of the Government to protect the workingmen against abuses and exploitation; to secure to them fair wages and reasonable return for their labor.

Let us beware of men who deliberately, for political or selfish aims, stir up discontent among the masses. They preach subversive doctrines, speak of evils and abuses that do not exist, or magnify those which often are inevitable in democracies. These men are the worst enemies of society, more dangerous to the community than ordinary criminals. They have no sympathy for the people, but are mere self-seekers, intent only in securing either pecuniary or political advantage for themselves. If as a result of their preachings, disorders occur, they cowardly disclaim all responsibility for that which none other than themselves had brought about. He who tries to curry favor with the masses by appealing to the passions of the people, stirring up their prejudices, or capitalizing discontent or human suffering, is unworthy of public trust.

LANDED ESTATES

The ownership of big landed estates by corporations or absentee landlords has invariably caused discontent and unrest among the tenants or occupants of such estates. The discontent among the tenants of the friar lands contributed to the causes which led to the rebellion against Spain. Those friar lands have been acquired by the Government and sold in small lots, but there are still a few large haciendas, particularly in Luzon, that are the hotbeds of discontent and unrest among their tenants. Not only for the sake of these tenants, but also in the interest of peace, every effort should be made to acquire these haciendas at a fair and just price to be sold in small lots to the tenants.

There are complaints in certain places that the tenants are the victims of unfair practices on the part of their landlords. These abuses must be stopped and the tenant protected in his rights.

LABOR

Fortunately for our country, we have had no sharp cleavages between labor and capital. Strikes have been few and far between, and they have never been long drawn out or general. That we have so far been spared the extremities of class warfare is no proof that we shall forever be exempt. Our good fortune should rather teach us to seek the means to preserve the country against such conflicts by the only method which experience has shown to be effective, namely, by taking steps designed to prevent the exploitation and oppression of the workingmen and thus assure their happiness and contentment.

Filipino laborers, compared to those of other oriental countries, receive higher wages and are much better protected in their rights by legislation. We have enacted many laws protecting labor. In all earnestness, however, I must say that we must go further in this direction. The experience of centuries shows that the one sure way to protect society against class war is to secure to wage earners their due.

I am against communism. I am a firm believer in the institution of private property. I contend, however, that whenever property rights come in conflict with human rights the former should yield to the latter.

If we would preserve the institution of private property, we must hold fast to this principle in the determination of conflicting rights between man and man. It is thus that we may draw the line between the rights of labor and capital and erect an economic structure based on the principle that human life is the measure of all other values, that considerations of possession and profit must give way to supremacy of human existence.

CAPITAL

A change in the political status of a country always gives rise to fear and misgivings. Not only among Americans and foreigners but even among a few Filipinos the impending political changes have caused anxiety as to the future.

There is no justification for these fears. I give assurance that peace, order, law, and justice will reign supreme under the commonwealth, and that the rights of foreigners and nationals alike will be safeguarded. Existing investments, whether foreign or national, will receive every inducement to stay, and outside capital will be welcomed. We especially desire that new American capital should come and help in the development of the country.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

I believe in the efficacy of the instrumentalities of peace, such as the League of Nations or treaties of neutrality. In due time we should apply for admission to the League and urge the negotiation of a multilateral treaty for the neutralization of the Philippines. However, we cannot ignore present-day realities. We cannot rely exclusively on these implements of peace for our national defense.

I favor preparedness for national defense. We cannot afford to have, nor do I approve of, a large standing army or costly military establishments, but we must have a regular army of sufficient size for our requirements and a trained citizenry ready to be drafted into service in any emergency. For the proper planning of our defenses and the organization and training of our regular and citizen army I shall secure the best expert advice.

OUR RELATIONS WITH AMERICA

It should be our constant endeavor to maintain the most friendly relations and closest collaboration with the United States. We owe much to America and we are grateful to her. Our present economy is tied up with the free American market. Many of our industries depend for their existence on our reciprocal free-trade relations with the United States, and we should try to maintain these trade relations if possible, even after independence. I shall spare no effort to obtain the elimination of the export tax provided in the independence law. I shall work for the repeal of the excise tax on coconut oil. I shall endeavor to take such action as may be required to place our trade relations with the United States on a truly reciprocal basis, so that they may be continued after independence for the mutual advantage of both countries.

FOREIGN RELATIONS

As already stated, our foreign relations will be under the control and supervision of the United States during the commonwealth; but there is nothing in the independence act which prevents the commonwealth from beginning to lay the foundations for our future relations with foreign nations. Indeed, the period of transition having been provided to give to the Filipino people time to prepare themselves for the responsibilities of an independent government, it can be rightly assumed that the United States meant to give us the opportunity, under the commonwealth, of initiating both political as well as trade relations with other countries, subject to its supervision and control.

We shall request the State Department at Washington to permit the commonwealth to send men as attachés to American legations or embassies as well as to American consulates in order that these men may acquire the knowledge and experience in the diplomatic service and provide our government with needed information concerning foreign trade.

It will be necessary, and to our advantage besides, to win the good will of, and maintain friendly relations with, other nations. But to accomplish this aim mere protestations of good purposes are not enough. We must deal fairly with all nations and respect their rights. We must secure to every foreigner who lives with us full protection of our lives. His life, his property, must be as safe among us as they are in his own land.

During the transition period we shall endeavor to find new markets for our products, so that if and when the market of the United States shall no longer be open to us, except on a competitive basis, we may not be left without outlet for our products.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

The question of Philippine independence has been settled. The independence law sets the day for independence and prescribes the process leading to its consummation. We accepted the independence law; we have approved a constitution pursuant to its provisions, and the people by ratifying it with practical unanimity have agreed to the grant of independence under the terms and conditions prescribed by the Congress. Independence, therefore, is no longer an issue either in the United States or in the Philippines. Insofar as the terms and conditions of independence are concerned, we made it plain when we accepted the independence law that we reserved the right to petition Congress for their modification with a view to making them less burdensome for our people and more adapted to the attainment of the purpose for which Congress intended them.

We consider the economic provisions of the independence law not entirely fair to the Philippines. We regard legislation recently passed by Congress, imposing greater restrictions on our free imports to the United States or authorizing the collection of exorbitant taxes on some of our products sold in that country, not only discriminatory but a virtual violation of the solemn covenant between the two countries. We shall exert every effort to secure the repeal of those discriminatory measures and to obtain amendments to the independence law looking to a more equitable trade arrangement between the United States and the Philippines during the commonwealth.

In relation to the transition period, the Congress of the United States fixed the term of 10 years, considering it necessary to allow the Philippines gradually to adjust their national economy to the conditions which will obtain when independence should eventuate and to permit the Filipinos to prepare themselves adequately for the responsibilities of independent nationhood. It was, therefore, chiefly for the benefit of the Philippines rather than of the United States that the intermediate period of 10 years was fixed. While there may be differences of opinion as to whether this period is too long or too short, all must agree that, if our trade relations with the United States during the commonwealth should prove more injurious to our country than they would under complete independence, the Philippines would then do well to hasten the date of separation from America. This fact will not be revealed to us until after the first years of the commonwealth and we have known the result of the economic conference between representatives of the United States and the Philippines which, I trust, will be called by the President of the United States at an early date.

Meanwhile, I consider it a most disturbing influence which will retard our work of economic readjustment and reconstruction for anyone to advocate now the shortening of the transition period. What the country direly needs today is a period of stability and business confidence, so that we may proceed unhampered in the task of erecting our new government and building up the national economy to increase the wealth of the Nation, promote commerce, agriculture, and industry, improve the conditions of our wage earners, and create economic opportunities for all our citizens. We need to give capital reasonable certainty as to those conditions which affect investment; we need to assure the industries that are dependent upon the free American market that no radical changes will take place which will bring about a sudden loss of the market on which they depend; we need above all to provide economic security for the masses of our people, which can only be accomplished through the maintenance of stable business conditions.

I yield to no one in my fervent desire to see the Philippines independent as soon as possible, but I cannot close my eyes to the fact that a difference of a few years may mean a great deal to the well-being of our people and the permanence of our national liberty. Besides, we should not be deluded into believing that it is possible for anyone at this time to obtain from Congress the shortening of the transition period. All the pleas that may now be submitted in support of this action had already been considered and passed upon by that body. No new reason can be advanced that had not been already submitted. Therefore, making an issue of the shortening of the transition period is unfair to our people and most injurious to their interests.

I am anxious to see our independence established at the earliest possible date. I look upon it as the most precious reward for the many years of ceaseless efforts that I have spent in its quest. I pledge myself anew resolutely to take all the necessary steps leading to the advent of independence, and to do everything in my power to make the Philippine republic strong and enduring, and the blessings of liberty not only the cherished possession of this generation but the priceless heritage of the Filipino people for all time.

SEE YOU LATER, OLD BOY

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a foreword by Will Rogers to a book of the Poet Russell, which foreword I think the Members generally will find worth while.

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, today, under the fair skies of California, the last rites are being performed over the mortal remains of Will Rogers, America's philosopher-humorist, and the world mourns his untimely passing.

For nearly 20 years Will Rogers has been one of our foremost citizens. His writings appeared daily in hundreds of publications. Without bitterness or malice they unerringly found the mark against which he launched them. They made us smile and laugh, but best of all they made us think, and that, unfortunately, is becoming a lost art in America.

Will Rogers has gone to his reward. Never again will he throw the lariat. Never again will he look for the chuck wagon. That quaint, humorous heart has been stilled and his kindly smile is now a pleasant and radiant memory. He has now taken up his abode where we all hope to go some day.

As this is being delivered Will is probably sitting out on the front stoop of that ranch home "under some cool shade trees" to which he refers in his introductory letter to the book written by the late Charles M. Russell, Montana cowboy artist, talking with his old dad and the "sweet looking old lady"—his sainted mother. That "cute little rascal" is sitting on his knee while Will's hands caress the "little rascal's" golden curls. A glorious reunion of real folks, the kind that made America. Will Rogers is not dead. He is merely away.

Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me this morning I desire at this point to insert the letter already referred to:

ROGERS' IDEA OF HEREAFTER WRITTEN TO FRIEND WHO DIED—TELLS AUTHOR TO SAVE JOKE FOR LINCOLN; "CAN'T WRITE MORE, DAMN PAPER'S WET"

NEW YORK, August 18.—Some of Will Rogers' thoughts on the hereafter were recalled today from the pages of a book written by his old friend, the late Charles M. Russell, Montana cowboy artist.

Russell died several years ago as he was about to complete the book Trails Plowed Under, a collection of reminiscences of the Old West.

Rogers wrote the introduction in the form of a letter to his old friend in the other world, saying:

"There ain't much news here to tell you. You know the big Boss gent sent a hand over and got you so quick Charley. But I guess He needed a good man pretty bad. I hear they been working short handed over there pretty much all the time, I guess its hard for Him to get hold of good men, they are just getting scarce everywhere. * * * I bet you hadn't been up there 3 days until you had cut your old pencil and was a drawing something funny about some of their old punchers. I bet you Mark Twain and old Bill Nye, and Whitcomb Riley and a whole bunch of those old joshers was just a waiting for you to pop in with all the latest ones.

"What kind of a bird is Washington and Jefferson? I bet they are regular fellows when you meet 'em, ain't they? Most big men are. I would like to see the bunch that is gathered around you the first time you tell the one about putting the limburger cheese in the old nester's whiskers. Don't tell that, Charlie, until you get Lincoln around you, he would love that. I bet you and him kinder throw in together when you get well acquainted. Darn it, when I get to thinking about all them top hands up there—if I could just hold a horse-wrangling job with 'em I wouldn't mind following that wagon myself.

"You will run onto my old dad up there, Charley, for he was a real cowhand, and I bet he is running a wagon, and you will pop into some well-kept ranch house over under some cool, shady trees and you will be asked to have dinner, and it will be the best one you ever had in your life. Well, when you are a thanking the women folks you just tell the sweet-looking little old lady that you know her boy back on an outfit you used to rep for, and tell the daughters that you knew their brother, and if you see a cute little rascal running around there, kiss him for me. Well, can't write you any more, Charles; damn paper's all wet; it must be raining in this old bunk house.

"Of course, we are all just a hanging on here as long as we can. I don't know why we hate to go; we know it's better there. Maby it's because we haven't done anything that will live after we are gone.

"From your old friend,

"WILL."

HUMANITY'S GREATEST BOON

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial I wrote on the subject of social security.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial on the subject of Social Security, written by me, which appeared in the Lewisburg (Pa.) Saturday News, August 17, 1935:

[From the Lewisburg (Pa.) Saturday News, Aug. 17, 1935]

In all recorded history, excepting in the words spoken and gentle acts performed by the Master, has any such stroke for humanity been delivered as that accomplished in the social-security legislation that finally became law this week?

We have voted for free school books for all children, and as many others have for free roads and free bridges, and far-flung helpfulness, paid poor taxes and aided in many charities, but nothing approaches this legislation.

To say that it is the greatest stroke for the relief of human suffering does not express what has been accomplished in so short a time. A Good Samaritan's act has had its day every day since it became a part of the Bible story of humanity. Hannah More, Rousseau, Frederick II, Cardinal Richelieu, Mirabeau, and others sought to lighten the load that broke bodies and hearts, but theirs were mere gestures in comparison to the magnitude of the legislation to which we refer and which we voted for and the President signed this week.

It is the translation of the cross of Christ—the Light of the World.

It is the final assault upon poverty, and poverty has abdicated.

Two thousand years of doubt and fear and disappointment, yet with that stern, rugged faith the Christian struggled and survived, and now at last triumphs. As Lincoln said at Gettysburg, if our liberty and free institutions cannot endure here, they cannot survive anywhere. So with the division of God's blessings in this favored land and chosen people.

With the inhumanity we see scourging Germany under the brutal lash of a modern Genghis Khan or Tamerlane, and the preparations being made to efface the last remaining government of free and independent Negro people, we have these laws coming from Washington as the crowning blessing bestowed upon the world's most munificent government, and setting an example that might be emulated by all empires and dictatorships and republics and peoples everywhere.

To the President who was in accord with this step, there cannot he denied the fullest credit. However erratic he and his advisers may be in new-deal dreams, there is in this something that sounds the depths of humanity, and gives the Christian spirit a new meaning. And there will be a new answer from those souls suffering in poverty and moaning in the anguish of repeated disappointment in their fellows.

There now comes renewed faith, and may wisdom so guide our leaders of state that our Government may so prosper that these great purposes may be carried out to the fullest and completest fruition.

B. K. F.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that privilege.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill——

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman for that purpose at this time.

Are there other requests for permission to extend remarks in the RECORD?

If not, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York.

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Rules Committee may have until midnight tonight to file certain reports. I am not as enthusiastic as the gentleman from New York, but I agree with him that the House has always been ahead of the Senate and that it is at this moment.

Mr. SNELL. Let us try to adjourn tonight; let us not quit until we get through.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that reports of the Rules Committee may be considered on the same day reported without the necessity of a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us how we shall be able to know when they will stop bringing in new legislation?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know; that is a puzzle to me.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from New York is the man responsible.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if this request is granted and rules are to be brought in here, will not the gentleman give us at least 10 or 15 minutes' notice so the House will have some idea of what is coming up?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will do my best.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the request of the gentleman from New York apply only to the rest of this session?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Then the gentleman should put it that way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put it that way.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman whether his request applies to any one particular bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, no. We have 8, 10, or 12 rules pending.

Mr. TREADWAY. I assume it includes the Railroad Retirement Act, so-called.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is almost a law; that passed the House.

Mr. TREADWAY. I mean the supplemental bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know. I have not even heard of that. We have the deficiency appropriation bill, which is most important.

Mr. SNELL. Let us take that up and get it out of the way.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand the Ways and Means Committee have reported out a tax bill. Will there be a rule for its consideration?

Mr. O'CONNOR. If it is a tax bill, a rule is not needed; they can bring it up at any time, for it has a privileged status.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I could not hear the request of the gentleman from New York. Would the Chair be so kind as to state it?

The SPEAKER. The request of the gentleman from New York is that during the remainder of the session the Committee on Rules may have the right to call up rules upon the same day they are reported without the necessity of a two-thirds vote. Have I stated the gentleman's request correctly?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The Chair has stated it correctly.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from New York if that includes any rule on the utility bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have no such thing in mind. I cannot anticipate.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I shall object to any such rule.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I cannot guarantee, but I cannot anticipate any such thing. As I understand, if the gentleman will yield, we hope to work out the utility bill situation and get a bill, but that would come up as a conference report. A conference report is privileged at all times and does not need a rule for its consideration.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I am willing that the gentleman's request may be granted, except as to any rule that may relate to the utility bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I cannot make any such bargain as that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I object.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8587) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 9, line 21, after "forthwith", insert "(and in pending proceedings immediately upon the effective date of this amendatory section)."

Page 10, line 15, strike out all after "year" down to and including "apply", in line 21.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman tell us in a word just what the amendments cover?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The Senate amendments provide for the appointment of trustees in pending reorganization cases. I may say to the gentleman from New York that under the general plan of the bill with reference to reorganizations that take place in the future it is provided that trustees shall be appointed. In the House bill, however, exceptions were made in those cases where reorganizations were pending. The Senate was of the opinion that trustees ought to be appointed also in pending cases.

I have consulted with all the members of the Judiciary Committee whom I contacted, and particularly the ranking minority member of the committee, Mr. PERKINS, of New York, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], who was chairman of the subcommittee on bankruptcy under the former administration, and I have found no objection anywhere to this matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted a privileged report on the bill (H. R. 9215) making appropriations to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 1881), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TABER reserved all points of order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 358.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 358

Resolved, That during the remainder of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress it shall be in order for the acting majority leader or the Chairman of the Committee on Rules to move that the House take a recess, and said motion is hereby made of the highest privilege; and it shall also be in order at any time during the remainder of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress to consider reports of the Committee on Rules, as provided in clause 45, rule XI, except that the provision requiring a two-thirds vote to consider such reports is hereby suspended during the remainder of this session of Congress.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual resolution offered at this time in the session. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOILEAU) there were—ayes 192, noes 18.

So the resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BITTER ROOT IRRIGATION PROJECT, MONTANA

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 946) to amend sections 3 and 4 of the act of July 3, 1930, entitled "An act for the rehabilitation of the Bitter Root irrigation project, Montana."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do so for the purpose of asking the gentleman a few questions with reference to this bill. I understand that the farmers on this particular project are subjected to a dual burden: First, in connection with the interest on the old bonds, which covered a private investment, and now the interest on the Government's investment. Is that the fact?

Mr. MONAGHAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CULKIN. I have investigated this matter, and I am glad to say that I am definitely for it. May I also say in this connection to the Members of the House that certain editors in the Northwest have claimed I was against the men on these irrigated projects. I am now and forever have been for the men on the land. Whatever I have done in this connection has been in an attempt to protect them. I certainly feel that the bill which the gentleman offers is timely and meritorious.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is the objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to negotiate and execute a contract with the Bitter Root Irrigation District, amending as provided herein articles 3 and 6 of the contract dated August 24, 1931, between the United States of America and said irrigation district. The amended contract shall segregate the district's obligation into two components: (1) All money advanced to the district under section 2, subsection (1) of the act of July 3, 1930, for liquidating bonded and other outstanding indebtedness of said district; and (2) all money advanced or used under section 2, subsections (2) and (3) of said act for construction, betterment, and repair work. All money advanced under component (1) shall be repaid to the United States within the period fixed in said contract, with interest at 4 percent per annum until paid: Provided, That all interest now due and unpaid on component (1) shall be added to and merged with the principal sum advanced under that component. Nothing herein contained shall be construed as authorizing a modification in said amendatory contract of the interest charges heretofore paid by the district under the contract of August 24, 1931.

SEC. 2. The amended contract shall provide also that all money advanced or used under section 2, subsections (2) and (3) of the act of July 3, 1930, shall be repaid to the United States without interest within the period fixed in said contract, and in the case of default in the payment when due of any installment fixed by the Secretary for repayment of money advanced or used under said section 2, subsections (2) and (3), there shall be added to the payment unpaid a penalty of one-half of 1 percent of the amount unpaid on the 1st day of each month thereafter so long as such default shall continue.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

APPOINTMENT OF NAVAL ACADEMY GRADUATES

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2521) amending section 5 of Public Law No. 264, Seventy-third Congress, approved May 29, 1934, relative to the appointment of Naval Academy graduates as ensigns in the Navy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the Committee on Rules for 2 weeks has had before it a rule providing for the consideration of an omnibus flood-control bill which concerns a great many projects all over the United States. If the time of the House is to be taken up all the afternoon by these private bills I am going to start objecting to every bill that comes up.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I may state to the gentleman this is not a private bill. This is a departmental measure.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, what is the bill the gentleman is so much interested in?

Mr. FERGUSON. The omnibus flood-control bill, which contains projects concerning the entire United States.

Mr. SNELL. I can inform the gentleman now that he will have a lot of trouble getting that bill through. If such an attempt is made, it will be very late tonight before the bill is finally considered.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am very happy to have the gentleman's opposition to this bill. I think it is a very fine bill, and I would like to have the Republican Party in the position of opposing it.

Mr. SNELL. Let me inform the gentleman that when you seek to pass such a bill appropriating $371,000,000, on top of all the other appropriations that have been made, the American people will oppose you.

Mr. FERGUSON. I wish to serve notice now that I am going to object to the next bill.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I may say that that flood-control bill is one of the greatest "pork barrel" bills ever presented to the Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON]?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of Public Law No. 264, Seventy-third Congress is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That section 1 of the act approved May 6, 1932 (47 Stat. 149; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 34, sec. 12), is hereby amended by inserting the words 'in 1934 and hereafter' after the words 'midshipmen who', and the words 'Provided, That all former midshipmen graduated in 1933 who received a certificate of graduation and honorable discharge or who resigned and whether they have since been married or not may, upon their own application, if physically qualified, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, be appointed as ensigns prior to August 1, 1935, by the President and shall take rank next after the junior ensign appointed in 1933 and among themselves in accordance with their proficiency as shown by the order of merit at date of graduation: And provided further', after the words 'Naval Academy' and by striking out 'in 1932, and at least 50 percent of all graduates in subsequent years: Provided', so that as amended the said section will read as follows:

"'That the President of the United States is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint as ensigns in the line of the Navy all midshipmen who in 1934 and hereafter graduate from the Naval Academy: Provided, That all former midshipmen graduated in 1933 who received a certificate of graduation and honorable discharge or who resigned and whether they have since been married or not may, upon their own application, if physically qualified, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, be appointed as ensigns prior to August 1, 1935, by the President and shall take rank next after the junior ensign then in the service and among themselves in accordance with their proficiency as shown by the order of merit at date of graduation: And provided further, That the number of such officers so appointed shall, while in excess of the total number of line officers otherwise authorized by law, be considered in excess of the number of officers in the grade of ensign as determined by any computation, and shall be excluded from any computation made for the purpose of determining the authorized number of line officers in any grade on the active list above the grade of lieutenant (junior grade) until the total number of line officers shall have been reduced below the number otherwise authorized by law.'"

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 6, strike out the words "appointed in 1933" and insert "of the Navy."

Page 2, line 24, strike out the words "then in the service" and insert the words "of the Navy."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 22, 1935.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I beg leave to inform you that I have this day transmitted to the Governor of Illinois my resignation as the Representative in the Congress of the United States from the Twenty-third District of Illinois, said resignation to be effective September 16, 1935.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM W. ARNOLD.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs may have permission to sit during sessions of the House this afternoon.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object, because I want to have the meeting; but I would like to know whether, in bringing in this neutrality legislation, the gentleman will permit the Members of the House to offer amendments.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That is a question that will be answered at the time. It depends upon how you gentlemen go along in committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

REAL-ESTATE BONDHOLDERS' REORGANIZATIONS

Mr. STARNES. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 352

Resolved, That the further expenses of conducting the investigation authorized by House Resolution 412 of the Seventy-third Congress and supplemented by House Resolution 39 and House Resolution 79 of the Seventy-fourth Congress, incurred by the Select Committee to Investigate Real Estate Bondholders' Reorganizations, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, shall not exceed an additional $20,000.

Mr. STARNES. Mr. Speaker, this resolution grants an additional sum of not to exceed $20,000 for the purpose of paying the expenses of conducting the investigation which was authorized by House Resolution 412 of the Seventy-third Congress and continued by House Resolutions 39 and 79, respectively, of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

This is the select committee which has been investigating the real-estate bondholders' reorganizations throughout the country. The Committee on Accounts feels that much good work has been done by this committee, and the committee believes that the amount which it has recommended to the House is sufficient to conclude the investigation, and the committee is of the opinion that this amount should be amply sufficient to care for any and all further expenses with reference to the investigation.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STARNES. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman think that this amount of money will be all the money that will have to be appropriated for this purpose?

Mr. STARNES. Yes; unless we have some very direct and positive instructions from the House.

Mr. RICH. Can the gentleman tell us where we are going to get the money?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STARNES. I yield for a question.

Mr. CHURCH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] a question, if I may. If this money is appropriated, is it the gentleman's opinion he can come in here in January with proper legislation recommended to accomplish the purposes for which the committee was appointed?

Mr. SABATH. I hope so. We have had a bill pending for some time, but, unfortunately, we have not been able to get action upon it. This resolution is absolutely necessary to finish the work, but whether we can finish with this small amount or not I do not know.

Mr. CHURCH. The gentleman states he hopes so, but can the gentleman assure us that he will have the legislation ready by January?

Mr. SABATH. We have it ready now, and the bill has been pending and hearings have been held before the Banking and Currency Committee and every member of the committee has been informed on the bill, but, unfortunately, we have not obtained action.

Mr. CHURCH. But there will be other legislation desired?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. And the gentleman thinks it will be ready by January?

Mr. SABATH. We think so.

Mr. STARNES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

RELIEF OF THE STATE OF INDIANA

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 3374) for the relief of the State of Indiana.

The Clerk read the title.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, I would like an explanation of the bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. I will be glad to explain it. The bill was passed unanimously by the Senate and it has been unanimously reported by the House Judiciary Committee. It is for the relief of the State of Indiana, and the amount involved is the sum of two checks which were issued for the benefit of the highway construction, and which were lost in transit. This bill simply authorizes the issuance of duplicate checks to the Indiana State authorities without requiring an indemnity bond. The Department of Agriculture recommends the passage of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of section 3646, as amended, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the Chief Disbursing Officer of the Treasury Department is authorized and directed to issue, without the requirement of an indemnity bond, duplicates of original checks nos. 66942 and 67000, drawn February 19 and February 20, 1935, in favor of "State Treasurer of Indiana, trust fund", for $2,743.34 and $5,241.35, respectively, and lost between the office of the State treasurer of Indiana and the designated depository.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING SECTION 36 OF THE EMERGENCY FARM MORTGAGE ACT OF 1933

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 6776, an act to amend section 36 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended, with Senate amendments, agree to the Sheppard amendment, and disagree to the Norris amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, let the gentleman make his statement so that we can know what the request is.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, this bill—H. R. 6776—passed the House sometime ago. In the Senate it was amended by Senator SHEPPARD so as to allow counties in the United States, where the Government had taken over large tracts of land for reforestation, conservation, protection of grazing areas, or preservation of wildlife, to present their claims to the R. F. C., and, if found eligible, to be granted loans for refinancing.

That was the Senator SHEPPARD amendment. The bill was further amended by Senator NORRIS. This amendment provides that the Electric Home and Farm Authority in Tennessee shall continue in business until February 1, 1937.

I want to agree to the Sheppard amendment and disagree to the Norris amendment.

Mr. SNELL. As the Sheppard amendment is germane to the bill, I am not going to object to it; but the other amendment does not belong in a bill of this character.

Mr. STEFAN. Does the gentleman from Oregon propose to disagree to the Norris amendment?

Mr. PIERCE. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. Then I object. I must object, Mr. Speaker, to protect the amendment of my colleague Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman proposes to disagree to the electric amendment?

Mr. PIERCE. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Why does not the gentleman ask unanimous consent to disagree to both Senate amendments and send it back there?

Mr. PIERCE. Because I think Senator NORRIS will recede from his amendment, and I am anxious to get the bill passed.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I still feel that I must protect the amendment by Senator NORRIS, and I object. But if, as the gentleman from Oregon states, he feels that Senator NORRIS will recede from his amendment, I shall be glad to withdraw my objection. However, until such time as the Senator from Nebraska does recede, I feel constrained to object. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

TIME CREDITS FOR SUBSTITUTE LABORERS, POST OFFICE

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7709, to provide time credits for substitute laborers in the Post Office when appointed as regular laborers, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7709, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the same. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That section 5 of the act entitled 'An act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes', approved February 28, 1925 (43 Stat. 1053; U. S. C., title 39, sec. 101), is amended by adding thereto a new paragraph to read as follows:

"'Whenever any substitute laborer, watchman, or messenger is appointed to a permanent position as laborer, watchman, or messenger, the substitute service performed by such laborer, watchman, or messenger shall be computed in determining the eligibility of such person for promotion to grade 2 on the basis of 306 days of 8 hours constituting a year's service. Effective at the beginning of the first quarter following approval of this act, all laborers, watchmen, and messengers who have not progressed to grade 2 shall be promoted to that grade, provided they have the necessary credit of 306 days of 8 hours each constituting a year's service.' "

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to provide time credits for substitute laborers in the Post Office when appointed as regular laborers."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman explain what this does and what it costs?

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, this merely gives to substitute laborers in the Postal Service time credits after they are named regularly, for such time as they put in as substitutes in the Service. For example, if a substitute laborer works 306 days over a period of 3 or 4 years, upon his being appointed as a regular he goes into grade 2, because he has already served his full apprenticeship as a substitute. It is placing them in the same category with substitute clerks, carriers, and employees of the Railway Mail Service by providing time credits for substitute laborers when they are appointed regularly.

Mr. SNELL. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

JOE GRAHAM POST, AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3184, to provide for the immediate settlement of the obligation of the Joe Graham Post of the American Legion arising out of the purchase of the Ship Island Military Reservation.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of the act entitled "An act providing for the sale to Joe Graham Post No. 119, American Legion, of the lands lying within the Ship Island Military Reservation, in the State of Mississippi", approved June 15, 1933, and the contract entered into on September 15, 1933, between the War Department and the Joe Graham Post No. 119, of the American Legion, Inc., the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to cause a reappraisal to be made of such lands and to accept, in full settlement of the obligation of said Joe Graham Post under the terms of said contract, such sum, not less than $1,658.22, as he deems fair and equitable in the light of such reappraisal.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

PROPOSED BURIAL OF WILL ROGERS AND WILEY POST IN ARLINGTON NATIONAL CEMETERY

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3436) to authorize the interment in the Arlington National Cemetery of the remains of the late Will Rogers and Wiley Post, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. In objecting to this bill I realize that I am placed in a very embarrassing situation. Will Rogers was a friend of mine for a great many years. I consider him an outstanding American in every respect. Arlington Cemetery has been set aside as sacred and hallowed ground exclusively for the burial of men who served in the armed forces of the United States. As far as I know there has been practically no exception. The only exception I am able to find is that President Lincoln's little boy was buried there when President Lincoln was Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. There was also an exception made that members of Mr. Wilson's war Cabinet might be buried there, but they were indirectly connected with the war. As far as I know during all these years there has never been any other exception.

Mr. Rogers was a great humorist, he was a great actor, he was a great American, but was never connected with the armed forces of the United States. I think it is a mistake in our hysteria over this terrible catastrophe that took the lives of these two men to do something that may come back to bother us in years to come. There will be a great many outstanding Americans in the future, as there have been in the past. We never have passed a bill to have any of those in the past buried in Arlington Cemetery, and I trust we will not do anything today to make such bills possible. I am doubtful whether the family of these two outstanding Americans desire this bill to pass. For the good of the American Congress for all time to come, so that it may not become a political question as to who shall and who shall not be buried in Arlington Cemetery, and as a friend of the Rogers family, I am forced to object to the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

DESIGN OF 50-CENT PIECE COMMEMORATING BIRTH OF DANIEL BOONE

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of H. R. 7678, to authorize the Director of the Mint to supplement the approved design of the 50-cent piece commemorating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Daniel Boone, the coinage of which was authorized by act of the Seventy-third Congress (Public, No. 258, S. 3355).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. TABER. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman say what this bill costs?

Mr. CHAPMAN. In reply to the question of the gentleman from New York, I will say it will not cost anything. It is merely an amendment which would authorize a slight change in the design of the Daniel Boone bicentennial memorial coins authorized by act of the last Congress, so that the figures "1934", the bicentennial anniversary of the birth of this great pioneer, may appear on the reverse side of the coin under the words "pioneer year", and in that way preserve the commemorative character of the coin which is being sold for the purpose of purchasing Boonsboro, Boone Station, and Blue Lick Battlefields, authorization of the acceptance of which as a pioneer national monument was made by an act of the Seventy-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, inasmuch as the annual change in coinage date required by law has caused the removal of the commemorative date of 1934 from the design originally approved and in use for the coinage of the 50-cent pieces commemorating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Daniel Boone, authorized by the Seventy-third Congress in Public Act No. 258 (S. 3355), the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be, and he is hereby, authorized to supplement the said design so that the reverse of said 50-cent piece will show the figures "1934" immediately above the words "pioneer year."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ENROLLMENT IN CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CAMPS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a House joint resolution, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That under allocations heretofore or hereafter made available for pay, maintenance, etc., of enrollees of the Civilian Conservation Corps from the appropriation in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, unemployed individuals not on public relief rolls may be enrolled under such regulations as the President may prescribe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, I do not know that I am opposed to that, but I should like the gentleman to tell us what the object of this is.

Mr. McCORMACK. I referred to this on the floor last Saturday. There is a misunderstanding as to whether or not the President can issue an Executive order authorizing the enrollment of young men who are not members of families receiving welfare relief. I received a letter from Col. Louis McHenry Howe stating it was mandatory under the present law. The purpose of this is to permit discretion with the President to authorize by Executive order the enrollment of young men outside of those who are members of families actually receiving welfare relief. For example, out of an authorized enrollment in Boston of 1,800 we only have 800 enrollments. The purpose of this resolution is to let young men whose families are not on the public relief rolls, otherwise eligible within the discretion of the President file application.

Mr. SNELL. That will not change the distribution throughout the country generally in any way, will it?

Mr. McCORMACK. No, no; it is not mandatory in any way. The President has permission.

Mr. TABER. Reserving the right to object, is not this the situation? The President now has authority to change this so as to do just what this resolution provides. There is not any sense at all of our passing resolutions that just permit the same thing to be done that can be done now under the law that has already been passed. All the President has to do is to change the regulations.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am not prepared to say that what the gentleman says is not correct, but it has been called to my attention and I have investigated, and I find there is an honest confusion. I put in the RECORD last Saturday a letter that I received from Col. Louis McHenry Howe stating it was mandatory under the present law. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has information to the contrary; but in any event this will clarify the situation. It will remove uncertainty and will permit no such uncertainty.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, this is the situation: Under that law the President may permit those to enroll in C. C. C. camps who may be eligible for relief, whether they are on the relief roll or not. I do not see why we should put those in C. C. C. camps who are not eligible for relief. I think under the circumstances we ought not to do this.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, early in June I took this matter up with the Executive. I was anxious to get some boys in the C. C. C. camps whose families were not actually on relief—families which needed relief, but were too proud to take relief. I wrote a letter to the President on June 10. The President replied on June 12. There is no question of his authority to place these boys, but he said it was not in accord with the policy of the works-relief bill, which was to take the three and a half million people now on the relief rolls and take care of them first before employment was given to other people. It is a definite policy of the administration. I agree that the President could do it now. I do not think that Colonel Howe's letter was right in law, but I am sure the Executive does not want to do what the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes.

The President's policy is to take care of those on the relief rolls. I agree with the purpose of the resolution, but I doubt whether there is any need of such legislation.

Mr. SNELL. The President has never come back to Congress to get our views on policy with respect to any of these other matters, and I do not see why we should do it on this.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not understand the President is asking for our policy at all.

Mr. SNELL. He has the power. I think that is sufficient.

Mr. McCORMACK. There is an honest question. If any gentleman feels the President has the power and is satisfied, then I have no disagreement with such gentleman.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no question. I was a member of the committee that prepared that bill, and I know what is in it. I know the President has the authority to do it now. I cannot see why we should pass a bill which delegates more authority to the President and still leaves it within his authority to do it or not, as he pleases.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

OVERTIME LABOR AT NAVY YARDS

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 872, an act for the allowance of certain claims for extra labor above the legal day of 8 hours at the several navy yards and shore stations certified by the Court of Claims, insist upon the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object for the purpose of obtaining information, what is the difference between the House and the Senate amendments?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. This is the bill in which the House fixed 10 percent for attorneys' fees but the Senate fixed 20 percent. I am asking that the House insist upon the provisions of its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. KENNEDY of Maryland, RAMSPECK, and GUYER.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 7167) to provide for unemployment compensation in the District of Columbia, authorize appropriations, and for other purposes, and ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the managers on the part of the House.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

R. 7167) to provide for unemployment compensation in the District of Columbia, authorize appropriations, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7167) to provide for unemployment compensation in the District of Columbia, authorize appropriations, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House bill limited the definition of "employers" to those who employ at least 4 persons for at least 13 weeks a year. The Senate amendment, which is in the form of a substitute for the House bill, applies to employers of one or more.

The House bill exempted (1) employment as an elected or appointed public officer, (2) employment by the District on an annual salary basis, (3) employment as a teacher in a public school. The Senate amendment exempts (1) domestic service in a private home, (2) casual labor, (3) members of the employer's family, (4) Federal employment, (5) employment performed for a Member of Congress in connection with his legislative duties, and (6) employment by the District as a school officer or teacher, a member of the police or fire department, or of an individual under the Retirement Act.

The House bill provided that the rate of contribution from an employer should be an amount equal to 3 percent of his pay roll, except that contributions could be increased up to 5 percent for employers with a high rate of unemployment, but could not be reduced below 3 percent. The Senate amendment provides that the rate of contribution shall be at the rate of 1 percent for the calendar year 1936, 2 percent for the calendar year 1937, and 3 percent thereafter, except that commencing in 1941 the rate of contribution will be varied from 1½ percent to 4 percent, based upon the compensation experience of such employer.

The House bill provided that the District should contribute, in addition to its regular contribution as an employer, an amount equal to 1 percent of the pay roll of all employers subject to this act. The Senate amendment contains no comparable provision.

Under the House bill benefits commenced in January 1937. The Senate amendment changes this provision to January 1938. The Senate amendment reduces maximum benefit from 26 weeks in a year, as provided in the House bill, to 16 weeks. The Senate amendment also provides that benefits will be proportioned to previous employment in the ratio of 1 week of benefits for each 3 weeks the employee has worked in the preceding 2 years. The ratio in the House bill was 1 to 4.

Under the House bill benefits were payable by checks drawn by the Treasury. The Senate amendment provides that benefits are to be paid through checks drawn by the Board on the District unemployment fund placed as a special deposit in the Treasury.

The House bill penalized an employee if he voluntarily quits his job without good cause by disqualifying him for benefits for the week in which he quits and for not exceeding the 3 next following weeks. The Senate amendment penalizes him for the week in which he quits and for 3 additional weeks. The House bill also provided that if an employee is discharged for misconduct he is disqualified for the week in which he is discharged and for not less than the 1 nor more than the 6 next following weeks. The Senate amendment disqualifies him for the week in which he is discharged and for from 3 to 6 additional weeks. The House bill provided that the weeks for which the individual is disqualified would be counted as if benefits had been paid in those weeks in determining the number of weeks of benefits to which the employee is entitled. This provision was not contained in the Senate amendment.

Under the House bill the administration of the act was vested in the Social Security Board, with an advisory commission composed of the District Commissioners and an employer and an employee representative. The Senate amendment establishes a local board to administer the act, to be composed of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as members ex officio, and one representative of employees and one representative of employers, to be appointed by the Commissioners. The Senate amendment also provides that the Board is to employ an executive officer to serve as its secretary and to act in the name of the Board in all matters delegated to him.

The conference agreement accepts the substance of the Senate amendment, with the following modifications:

1. Provision is made for contribution by the District in addition to its contribution as an employer, $100,000 for the calendar year 1936, $125,000 for the calendar year 1937, and $175,000 for the calendar year 1938.

2. The Senate amendment defined "employment office" as a free public employment office or branch thereof in the District, operated by the United States Employment Service or by the District. The conference agreement strikes out the language "or by the District."

3. The Senate amendment provides that if an employee is discharged for misconduct he is disqualified for benefits for the week in which he is discharged, and for from 3 to 6 additional weeks, depending upon the severity of the offense. The conference agreement provides, as did the House bill, that the additional penalty should be from 1 to 6 weeks.

ACCEPTANCE OF BIDS FOR GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS MADE SUBJECT TO CODES OF FAIR COMPETITION

Mr. UTTERBACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 163 to authorize the acceptance of bids for Government contract made subject to codes of fair competition.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this matter should be explained. Let us know what it is.

Mr. UTTERBACK. Mr. Speaker, this is validating legislation to authorize the acceptance of bids for Government contracts made subject to the codes which the Comptroller General, because of the decision in the Schechter case, has held illegal. The bill provides for validating these bids on condition that the bidders sign an agreement with the approval of the surety on the bond that he will comply with any laws subsequently passed by Congress with reference to hours of labor, minimum wages, and such things.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is one of the bills the gentleman referred to on the floor the other day and to which I objected. I think my objection was based primarily upon the statement from the Comptroller General that the bill was unworkable, that it could not be checked up, and that it was not practicable. With a report like that coming from the Comptroller General, if I am correct, I do not think this is a bill that should be brought up under unanimous consent.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa if this is the bill that provides for continuation of the N. R. A., in effect, on contractors dealing with the Federal Government?

Mr. MICHENER. This is not the Walsh bill, to which the gentleman objects. There are two Walsh bills.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield that I may explain the bill?

Mr. MICHENER. Certainly.

Mr. MEAD. I shall try to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of contracts, and a small number of contracts at that, that were pending and about closed when the N. R. A. decision went into effect. It will cost the Government as much money to call for new bids by eliminating all these contracts as they may save by insisting upon reduced labor conditions which may follow a court decision. Now, if the Government will accept these bids and award these contracts, the contractors will agree to give the workers the labor conditions prescribed in the N. R. A. code for the particular industry.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Is it not a fact that through the pending bill the Government is going to enforce the N. R. A. which the Supreme Court declared to be unconstitutional?

Mr. MEAD. That is not this bill. They cannot go ahead with these contracts, a small number of them. They were practically precluded by the decision.

Mr. MICHENER. These bids were let on specifications prepared when the N. R. A. was in effect.

Mr. UTTERBACK. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The bids were let on that basis.

Mr. UTTERBACK. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. But the Comptroller General will not approve the vouchers for the contracts because the contracts are illegal inasmuch as the general law provides that the contract must go to the lowest bidder. The N. R. A. placed an illegal limitation on the bidder, which prevented there being a legal lowest bidder. This bill validates those contracts, but the Comptroller General says that he will be in position that he cannot tell whether or not the subcontractors way down the line have complied with the codes. He does not know; he says his accountants cannot tell.

Mr. SNELL. If the statement of the gentleman from Ohio is correct, why should we consider the bill?

Mr. MEAD. There are about 60 contracts all told, I am informed, and to straighten the matter out with respect to this particular contract will result in a saving.

Mr. SNELL. This gives our approval to an illegal contract.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand the situation, these contracts were let when N. R. A. was in operation, and the Comptroller General later held that by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court which changes the basis of the contract that these contracts could no longer be recognized as enforceable. This legislation is intended to meet that situation. As I understand its provisions it permits a refiguring of these contracts so that whatever effect may have resulted from the N. R. A. being knocked out or that may have resulted in reducing the cost of labor, material, or any other thing that happened as a result could be estimated and figured by the Comptroller General and added to or reduced from the price agreed upon in the original contract.

Mr. SNELL. Is that the principle involved in this bill?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I understand that is all there is to the bill.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will this bill affect any of the naval contracts?

Mr. UTTERBACK. If it affects them in any way it validates those contracts.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Very well; I want to make this observation: We pass laws of this kind for the protection of labor, and I have supported all of them, and I am in favor of this one. However, what happens? We pass the laws and send them over to the administration to enforce them. Labor is led to believe that they have acquired certain rights by virtue of this type of legislation. The departments in charge of enforcing these labor provisions have not only ignored them, not only have they been negligent, but they have also been guilty of deliberately using their executive power to force labor to submit to intolerable conditions. For example, let us take into consideration what is happening today in Camden, N. J., where a strike has been going on for 13 weeks between the New York Shipbuilding Co., which has a contract with the Navy Department, and its employees. This contract has ample provisions to protect labor. Yet the Department of Labor and the Navy Department are frustrating every clause in the contract which is for labor's benefit. We are simply fooling the American workers. Labor legislation in Congress on the one hand; on the other hand, double dealing, negligence, protection of labor exploiters, ignoring of workers' appeals on the part of the Navy and Labor Departments. How long do you think the American workers are going to let you get away with this double-cross?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I hope my colleagues on the Republican side will not object. These contracts were advertised in due form, and there are only a very few of them.

Mr. MICHENER. Now the gentleman is making a statement contrary to the fact. He stated there were only a few. If the gentleman has any accurate facts we would be glad to hear them, but I do not want him to make the statement that there are only a few and that he hopes the Republicans will not object., I think the gentleman should know what he is talking about before he makes such statements.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I make the statement on the basis of statements made to me. I know there are some of these contracts which involve subcontractors. If this resolution is not agreed to there will be losses involved and the Government will have to spend a lot of money.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman makes a lot of statements he does not know anything about. Therefore I object.

PUBLIC-UTILITY HOLDING COMPANIES

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is only fair to the Members of the House to make a short statement. The conferees on the public-utilities holding company bill have reached an impasse on paragraph (b) of section 11 in that bill. The Senate has made a proposal for a compromise on paragraph (b) of section 11, which the majority of the House conferees have refused to accept. Immediately after 3 o'clock I shall ask the privilege of offering a motion to instruct the House conferees to agree to the proposal of the Senate committee. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that copies of the proposal are available at this time.

HELEN GALLAGHER DOMINIAN

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 3386) for the relief of Helen Gallagher Dominian.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us about this bill?

Mr. BLOOM. This is a bill for the relief of the widow of a man who died in Montevideo, Uruguay. It has passed the Senate and has been favorably reported by the House committee. It is the usual bill for a year's salary for the widow of someone who died in the service.

Mr. TABER. Was the deceased an employee of the State Department?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. TABER. In this particular case, is it a widow who receives the benefit under this bill?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes; this is for the widow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Helen Gallagher Dominian, widow of Leon Dominian, late Foreign Service officer, class 3, Montevideo, Uruguay, the sum of $7,800, being 1 year's salary of her deceased husband who died while in the Foreign Service; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purpose of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

THE HOMESTEAD NATIONAL MONUMENT OF AMERICA, NEBRASKA

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1307) to establish the Homestead National Monument of America in Gage County, Nebr.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us what this bill is all about?

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the Homestead National Monument of America in Gage County, Nebr. It has the recommendation of the committee, the Bureau of the Budget, and the Secretary of the Interior. We have gone to the President in reference to the bill and he endorses it.

The Senate passed the bill on March 29, 1935.

This is a very meritorious bill. Under its provisions a national park would be established to perpetuate in the minds and thoughts of the present generation and generations to come the greatest single factor in the development of our great and glorious West. It has been our practice to erect monuments and memorials to honor our distinguished and revered dead, and we have created a system of national parks in regions of great natural beauty or of unusual topographic conformation. In the creation of this proposed national park there is no attempt to create such a memorial park, but rather to bring into being a lasting monument to the greatest and most heroic band of men, women, and children that ever served a nation. No words of mine can depict the terrible struggle against nearly overwhelming odds, the tragedy and heartbreak of those sturdy pioneers, nor the spirit of manifest destiny and faith in their country which drove these heroes on to their glorious achievement. That story, which is the story of the winning of the West, has often been told, and there are some men here today who can remember some parts of that story from personal experience.

In March of 1862 the Great Emancipator signed the Homestead Act, an act which has proven one of the most far-sighted single pieces of legislation ever enacted. Following the signing of that act multitudes of men, no longer content with conditions under which they were then living, and others, seeing the great vista of economic betterment to be found farther west, joined with their brothers who felt that pioneer urge to wrest with their hands from the soil a new homeland. Westward, ever westward, in an ever-increasing stream drove these pioneers, taking advantage of the provision of a provident government to gain title to land which they could call their own and bequeath to unborn generations. This was no easy task which confronted these homesteaders, but rather a long and arduous struggle against the most overwhelming odds. No greater group of heroes, men and women, ever fought for a country than those who wrested the virgin prairies, timbered hillsides, and silver streams from a provident, though oftentimes cruel and harsh, Nature.

Now we are asking that the homestead of Daniel Freeman, which was the first homestead ever established under this act, shall be established as a national park. Situated in one of the most fertile and productive regions in our country, this tract of land can be created into a lasting monument to one of the greatest acts of our Government, the greatest achievement of our Nation, and to the heroes, men and women from every State in the Union, who brought about the winning of the West.

This park, when established, shall contain a replica of the Daniel Freeman log cabin and such other buildings as are necessary to establish a museum and repository for literature dealing with this great epoch in American history. To you gentlemen and gentlewomen from whose States were recruited those hearty settlers who, under the Homestead Act, settled on this free land, I ask support in establishing this park. It is not a matter of State or local interest, but one of national interest and done in which we, as citizens of the United States, should be proud. The free lands are gone, and these 48 States have been united into an economic and social whole. In order that future generations may have before them a monument to the great Homestead Act and to the unsung heroes and heroines of peace, I ask the establishment of the Homestead National Monument of America.

Mr. TABER. How much will it cost?

Mr. LUCKEY. It will cost $24,000 to establish the entire monument.

Mr. TABER. We have adopted a policy that we should not indulge in that sort of thing any more. Therefore, I object.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman withhold his objection until I make a statement?

Mr. TABER. I withhold my objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the view expressed by the gentleman from New York that there is an inclination to object to this type of bill. However, I may say that the State of Nebraska, representing the agricultural Middle West, believes that this bill is one in which an exception could well be made, for the reason that this memorial will set an example of the hardihood of the original pioneers who took homesteads in the Middle West and of the service they rendered the Nation. From a political standpoint, it represents the advantage of combined Federal relief and rugged individualism, for the reason that this man in 1862 secured the land from the United States Government, and by his own individual efforts improved the land and assisted in building the State of Nebraska to the point where it is today.

Mr. TABER. I may say to the gentleman that I have voted against bills involving monuments every time they have come up. The other day, in connection with my own State, I voted against it, and so have several other gentlemen on this side. We thought that we ought to take our own medicine and not do any more of this sort of thing.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection one more minute?

Mr. TABER. This is a general policy, and we are ready to take our own medicine as well as everybody else.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman withhold his objection in order that this bill may be considered and an amendment introduced eliminating the appropriation of $24,000?

Mr. TABER. That would mean the Interior Department would take over and maintain it, and I think we ought not to go any further in the matter.

The regular order was demanded.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

WILLIAM E. WILLIAMS

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1483) for the relief of William E. Williams.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us what this bill does?

Mr. MOTT. Yes; this bill permits William E. Williams, a man from Astoria, Oreg., who was injured during a storm at sea while on the lighthouse tender Manzanita, to file a claim with the United States Employees' Compensation Commission. This man was in the hospital for more than a year after he was injured and finally had to have his leg amputated, and in the meantime the time for filing the claim had passed.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, where is this bill on the Private Calendar?

Mr. MOTT. About 60 bills following the point where we are now.

Mr. McFARLANE. Has the bill been objected to?

Mr. MOTT. No; it never has been reached.

Mr. TABER. Has the bill been reported by the House committee?

Mr. MOTT. It has been unanimously reported by the House committee and unanimously passed by the Senate.

Mr. McFARLANE. When did the injury for which you are now asking compensation occur?

Mr. MOTT. The injury occurred in 1932.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. It is merely a jurisdictional bill?

Mr. MOTT. It is a jurisdictional bill allowing him to file the claim.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the only reason the Commission has not taken jurisdiction due to the fact that the claim was not filed within the 1-year period?

Mr. MOTT. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. And this bill simply gives them the right to file a claim?

Mr. MOTT. That is all, and the reason he did not file his claim was due to the fact that he was in the hospital off and on, and finally had to have the leg amputated, and at that time the 1-year period had expired. The bill is favorably recommended by the Commission.

The regular order was demanded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions and limitations of sections 15 to 20, both inclusive, of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended, are hereby waived in the case of William E. Williams (claim no. 398860); and the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is authorized and directed to consider and act upon any claim filed with the Commission within 1 year after the date of the enactment of this act, by said William E. Williams for compensation under the provisions of said act of September 7, 1916, as amended, for disability alleged to be due to injuries received by him while employed on the lighthouse tender Manzanita at Astoria, Oreg., in January 1932: Provided, That compensation, if any, shall be paid from and after the date of enactment of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

OMNIBUS PENSION BILL

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9074) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and so forth, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependents of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain what this bill does?

Mr. GASQUE. I will state that this is an omnibus pension bill, the first one reported by the committee in 3 years. The committee has adopted very stringent rules and we are only granting pensions to those soldiers and sailors who are right on the border line.

The bill carries 110 small pensions amounting to about $22,170 only, and I may say while I am answering the gentleman that the committee has adopted a new policy and this year we have taken up with the Veterans' Administration bills that have been introduced by Members of Congress which we felt should be settled in the Bureau. We have had about 65 pensions granted by the Bureau on bills that were introduced by Members of Congress who had not followed them through.

Mr. TABER. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

TRI-STATE COMPACT

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 159), which is the same as the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 349), granting the consent of Congress to the States of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut to enter into a compact for the creation of the interstate sanitation district and the establishment of the interstate sanitation commission.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the joint resolution carry any appropriation?

Mr. CELLER. No; it does not.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman give an explanation of the joint resolution?

Mr. CELLER. The joint resolution simply permits the States of New Jersey, Connecticut, and New York to enter into a compact for the clearing up of the pollution in the waters adjoining these various States.

The Governors of the States must have legislation for this compact, otherwise the proceedings will be abortive.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The committee gave very careful consideration to this matter, and it is really a routine matter.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does this bill carry any authorization which requires the Government to pay any money?

Mr. CELLER. Not a penny.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 159

Whereas the State of New York and the State of New Jersey desire to create the interstate Sanitation District and to establish the Interstate Sanitation Commission, in accordance with the terms of a compact to which by its terms the State of Connecticut is empowered to become a party, which compact is as follows:

TRI-STATE COMPACT

Whereas the tremendous growth of population and the development of the territory surrounding and adjacent to the harbor of New York has resulted in recent years in an increasingly serious pollution of the harbor, coastal, and tidal waters in such area and the tributary waters therein; and

Whereas such pollution constitutes a grave menace to the health, welfare, and recreational facilities of the people living in such area and is occasioning great economic loss; and

Whereas the control of future pollution and the abatement of existing pollution in the waters in such area is of prime importance to the people living in such area and can best be accomplished through the cooperation of the States of New Jersey and

New York and Connecticut by and through a joint or common agency: Now, therefore,

The State of New York and the State of New Jersey and the State of Connecticut do agree and are bound as follows:

ARTICLE I

1. Each of the signatory States pledges each to the other faithful cooperation in the control of future pollution and agrees to provide for the abatement of existing pollution in the tidal and coastal waters in the adjacent portions of the signatory States defined herein as coming within the district, and consistent with such object, to enact adequate legislation which will enable each of the signatory States to put and maintain the waters thereof in a satisfactory sanitary condition and particularly to protect public health; to render safe such waters as are now used or may later become available for bathing and recreational purposes; to abate and eliminate such pollution as becomes obnoxious or causes a nuisance; to permit the maintenance of major fish life, shellfish, and marine life in waters now available or that may by practicable means be made available for the development of such fish, shellfish, or marine life; to prevent oil, grease, or solids from being carried on the surface of the water; to prevent the formation of sludge deposits along the shores or in the waterways; and with the fulfillment of these objectives to abate and avoid incurring unnecessary economic loss by safeguarding the rights of the public in its varied legitimate uses of the waters of the district.

ARTICLE II

1. To that end they do agree that there shall be created, and they do hereby create, a district, to be known as the "Interstate Sanitation District" (hereinafter referred to as the "district"), which shall embrace the territory described as follows:

All the coastal, estuarial, and tidal waters within or covering portions of the signatory States as follows:

(a) In Connecticut, Long Island Sound, and estuaries and tidal waters thereof between the easterly side of New Haven Harbor at Morgan Point and the Connecticut-New York State boundary, and the Housatonic River up to the northerly boundary lines of the towns of Stratford and Milford.

(b) In New York, all of the tidal waters of Greater New York City; including Kill Van Kull and Arthur Kill, Long Island Sound, and the estuaries and tidal waters thereof between the New York City line and the New York-Connecticut State boundary and between the New York City line and the easterly side of Port Jefferson Harbor; the Atlantic Ocean and the estuaries and tidal waters thereof between the New York City line and the easterly side of Fire Island Inlet; and the Hudson River and estuaries and tidal waters thereof between the New York-New Jersey State boundary and the northerly line of Rockland County on the westerly side and between the northerly line of New York City and the northerly line of Westchester County on the easterly side of the river.

(c) In New Jersey, the Hudson River and New York Upper Bay, and estuaries and tidal waters thereof, between the New York-New Jersey boundary and Constable Point on Constable Hook; the Kill Van Kull and Arthur Kill to the mouths of the rivers entering into the Kills; Newark Bay and the estuaries thereof up to the mouth of the Passaic River, and up to the mouth of the Hackensack River; Raritan Bay, together with the Raritan River up to the Victory Bridge on said river between Perth Amboy and South Amboy, together with the Cheesequake Creek up to the New York & Long Branch Railroad bridge on said creek at Morgan; together with the Matawan Creek up to the New York & Long Branch Railroad bridge on said creek at Matawan; Sandy Hook Bay, together with the Shrewsbury River up to the passenger railroad bridge between Navesink Light and Highland Beach on said river.

ARTICLE III

1. There is hereby created the Interstate Sanitation Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "commission"), which shall be a body corporate and politic, having the powers, duties, and jurisdiction herein enumerated and such other and additional powers as shall be conferred upon it by the act or acts of a signatory State concurred in by the others and by the act or acts of Congress when necessary.

ARTICLE IV

1. The commission shall consist of five commissioners from each State, each of whom shall be a resident voter of the State from which he is appointed.

The commissioners shall be chosen in the manner and for the terms provided by law of the State from which they shall be appointed, and each commissioner may be removed or suspended from office as provided by the law of the State from which he shall be appointed. The commissioners shall serve without compensation, but shall be paid their actual expenses incurred incident to the performance of their duties.

ARTICE V

1. The commission shall elect from its number a chairman and vice chairman and shall appoint and at its pleasure remove or discharge such officers and legal, clerical, expert, and other assistants as may be required to carry the provisions of this compact into effect, and shall fix and determine their duties, qualifications, and compensations.

It shall adopt a seal and suitable bylaws and shall promulgate rules and regulations for its management and control.

It may maintain one or more offices for the transaction of its business and may meet at any time or place within the signatory States.

A majority of the members from each State shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, the exercise of any powers, or the performance of any duties, but no action of the commission shall be binding unless at least three of the members from each State shall vote in favor thereof.

The commission shall keep accurate accounts of all receipts and disbursements and shall make an annual report to the Governor and the legislature of each State setting forth in detail the operations and transactions conducted by it pursuant to this compact, and shall make recommendations for any legislative action deemed by it advisable, including amendments to the statutes of the signatory States which may be necessary to carry out the intent and purpose of this compact, and changes in the district which concentration of population or other cause may require.

The commission shall not incur any obligations for salaries or office or other administrative expenses prior to the making of appropriations adequate to meet the same, nor shall the commission pledge the credit of any of the signatory States except by and with the authority of the legislatures thereof. Each State reserves the right to provide hereafter by law for the examination and audit of the accounts of the commission by its comptroller or other official.

The commissioners shall meet and organize within 10 days after the effective date of this compact.

ARTICLE VI

1. It is recognized by the signatory States that, where tidal waters are used for such varied purposes as bathing, navigation, shellfish culture, the development of fish life, and the disposal of wastes, no single standard of purity is practicable in all parts of the district. In order to attain the objects of this compact, the commission, after proper study and after conducting public hearings upon due notice, shall group the designated waters of the district into classes. Where local conditions shall have changed in the future to such an extent that changes in classification become necessary, the commission may, after conducting public hearings upon due notice, adopt such changes.

Two general classifications shall be used:

(1) Class A, in which the designated water areas are expected to be used primarily for recreational purposes, shellfish culture, or the development of fish life;

(2) Class B, in which the designated water areas are not expected to be used primarily for recreational purposes, shellfish culture, or the development of fish life.

ARTICLE VII

1. It is agreed between the signatory States that no sewage or other polluting matters shall be discharged or permitted to flow into, or be placed in, or permitted to fall or move into the tidal waters of the district, except under the following conditions and restrictions:

(1) All sewage discharged or permitted to flow into class A waters of the district shall first have been so treated as—

(a) to remove all floating solids and at least 60 percent of the suspended solids; and

(b) To effect a reduction of organisms of the B. coli group (intestinal bacilli) so that the probable number of such organisms shall not exceed 1 per cubic centimeter in more than 50 percent of the samples of sewage effluent tested by the partially confirmed test: Provided, however, That in the case of discharge into waters used primarily for bathing, this bacterial standard need not be required except during the bathing season; and

(c) to effect a reduction in the oxygen demand of the sewage effluent sufficient to maintain an average dissolved-oxygen content in the tidal waters of the district and in the general vicinity of the point of discharge of the sewage into those waters, at a depth of about 5 feet below the surface, of not less than 50-percent saturation during any week of the year. (2) All sewage discharged or permitted to flow into class B waters of the district shall first have been so treated as—

(a) to remove all floating solids and at least 10 percent of the suspended solids, or such additional percentage as may by reason of local conditions be necessary to avoid the formation of sludge deposits in the class B waters of the district; and

(b) to effect a reduction in the oxygen demand of the sewage effluent sufficient to maintain an average dissolved-oxygen content in the tidal waters of the district and in the general vicinity of the point of discharge of the sewage into those waters, at a depth of about 5 feet below the surface, of not less than 30 percent saturation during any week of the year.

ARTICLE VIII

1. Each of the signatory States agrees that, insofar as waters within its jurisdiction may flow into any portion of the district, all sewage discharged or permitted to flow into any stream tributary to the tidal waters of the district shall be treated to that extent, if any, which may be necessary to maintain such tributary immediately above its confluence with the tidal waters of the district in a sanitary condition at least equal to the classification requirements determined by the commission for the tidal waters of the district into which it discharges. The waters of the Hudson River, immediately above the mouth of Sparkhill Creek on the westerly side and the New York-New Jersey boundary extended on the easterly side of the river, shall be maintained in a sanitary condition at ebb tide at least equal to the sanitary condition prevailing in the waters of the river immediately below said boundary at flood tide.

ARTICLE IX

1. Nothing in this compact shall be construed to repeal or prevent the enactment of any legislation or the enforcement of any requirement by any signatory State imposing any additional conditions and restrictions to further lessen or prevent the pollution of waters within its jurisdiction.

ARTICLE X

1. Subject to the provisions of this compact, the commission, as soon as may be after its organization, after an investigation and after conducting public hearings upon due notice, shall by order prescribe the reasonable date on or before which each municipality or other entity discharging sewage into the designated waters within the district shall be treating such sewage in accordance with the standards specified in this compact. Such order may prescribe that certain specific progress shall be made at certain definite times prior to the final date fixed in such order.

It is the desire of all parties to accomplish the objects herein set forth with the least possible injury to investments which have already been made in the construction of sewage-treatment plants within the district, and where changes or additions to such plants would be necessary to conform to the standards herein adopted, a reasonable time to effect such changes or additions may, in the discretion of the commission, be granted.

ARTICLE XI

1. Each of the signatory States agrees that it will prohibit the pollution of the said waters within the district in accordance with the several articles of this compact, and that it will enact suitable and adequate legislation which will accomplish effectively the objects of this compact and which will enable its officers, departments, boards, and agents to accomplish satisfactorily the obligations and duties assumed by the State under the terms of this compact; and it is further agreed that the courts of the several States shall have jurisdiction to enforce as against any person, corporation, municipality, or other entity or any employee, department, or subdivision of the respective signatory States any and all provisions of this compact.

The commission shall have authority to investigate and determine if the requirements of the compact and/or the orders of the commission pursuant thereto are complied with and if satisfactory progress has not been made, to bring action in its own name in the proper court or courts to compel the enforcement of any and all of the provisions of this compact, and/or the orders of the commission pursuant thereto.

ARTICLE XII

1. In order that future pollution be controlled and existing pollution be abated with the greatest possible economy and efficiency, the commission shall cooperate and advise with the respective State and district authorities having jurisdiction over stream pollution, with a view to coordinating their activities and securing the most satisfactory results at lower cost. For such purpose the commission may prepare a general plan of the most practicable and economical method of securing conformity with the standards herein set forth, having in view the future growth and development of the district. Such plan when completed shall be submitted to the Governor and the legislature of each State and to the State agency or agencies or district agencies in charge of sewage problems.

The provisions of this act shall not affect the discharge from the outfall pipes of the Passaic Valley sewerage system into the waters of New York Harbor: Provided, however, That said discharge shall be in accordance with the terms and provisions of the stipulation entered into on April 14, 1910, between the United States of America and Passaic Valley sewerage commissioners.

ARTICLE XIII

1. Terms used in this compact are defined as follows:

"District" means the area more particularly described in article II of this compact.

"Commission" means the Interstate Sanitation Commission.

"Municipality" means any city, incorporated village, borough, county, town, township, district, or any municipality governed by an improvement commission, any joint sewer commission, or any other subdivision of any one of the signatory States located within the district.

"Rule or regulation" means any rule or regulation established by the commission not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States or of any signatory State promulgated by the commission touching the abatement of pollution of the waters of the district.

"Tidal waters" means all those waters which ebb and flow within the designated district.

"Dissolved oxygen" is the gaseous oxygen held in solution by the water at any given time. It is expressed as a percentage of the maximum amount of oxygen that would be required to saturate the water under the existing conditions of temperature and salinity.

"Pollution" is any foreign matter which renders waters unfit to sustain fish life and unsatisfactory for bathing.

"Sewage effluent" means the treated sewage discharged from a treatment plant.

"Suspended solids" means those solid particles carried in suspension in the untreated sewage or sewage effluent.

"Entity" means any organization or association owning, controlling, or operating a sewerage system or treatment plant within a municipality.

ARTICLE XIV

1. The signatory States agree to appropriate annually for the salaries and office and other administrative expenses such sum or sums as shall be recommended by the commission and approved by the Governors of the signatory States, the State of New York and the State of New Jersey agreeing each to appropriate 45 percent thereof, and the State of Connecticut agreeing to appropriate 10 percent thereof. The State of New York and the State of New Jersey obligate themselves hereunder, however, only to the extent of $15,000 each in any one year, and the State of Connecticut obligates itself hereunder only to the extent of $3,333.34 in any one year.

ARTICLE XV

1. Should any part of this compact be held to be contrary to the constitution of any signatory State or of the United States, all other severable objects of this compact shall continue to be in full force and effect.

ARTICLE XVI

1. This compact shall become effective as to the State of New Jersey and the State of New York immediately upon the signing thereof by the representatives of such States, and thereafter it shall also become effective as to the State of Connecticut immediately upon the signing thereof by the representatives of such State: Provided, however, That prior to the signing of this compact by the representatives of the State of Connecticut, the district as set forth in article II shall not embrace any territory within the jurisdiction of the State of Connecticut, nor shall the commission exercise any jurisdiction or perform any duties or acts affecting such territory; and the appropriations for salaries and office and other administrative expenses shall be borne equally by the State of New York and the State of New Jersey.

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the States of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut to enter into the compact hereinbefore recited, and to each and every part and article thereof: Provided, That nothing contained in such compact shall be construed as empowering or in any manner affecting any right or jurisdiction of the United States in and over the region which forms the subject of such compact.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this joint resolution is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ATTACHING CERTAIN POSSESSIONS TO INTERNAL-REVENUE DISTRICTS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill S. 2652, an act to authorize the President to attach certain possessions of the United States to internal-revenue collection districts for the purpose of collecting processing taxes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPE. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, all this bill does is to permit the administration of the sugar bill for the Philippine Islands, the American Samoa, and the Virgin Islands to be attached to any convenient revenue district for the purpose of making collections of revenue taxes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. What is the process now?

Mr. JONES. At present they are not allowed to attach it to any convenient revenue district. The bill provides that the various islands for the collection of sugar taxes may be attached to the most convenient collection district.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It is simply to expedite the collection of taxes.

Mr. JONES. That is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (f) of section 10 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended by section 7 of the act of May 9, 1934 (48 Stat. 670), be further amended by adding at the end of such subsection the following: "The President is authorized to attach by Executive order any or all of such possessions to any internal-revenue collection district for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title insofar as they have become applicable."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out "insofar as they have become applicable" and insert "with respect to the collection of taxes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The House bill was laid on the table.

PAYMENT OF CERTAIN CLAIMS OF GRAIN ELEVATORS, ETC.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 72, authorizing and directing the Comptroller General of the United States to certify for payment certain claims of grain elevators and grain firms to cover insurance and interest on wheat during the years 1919 and 1920 as per a certain contract authorized by the President.

The Clerk reported the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and ask the gentleman to explain the resolution.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was approved by the President of the United States. The money is available for payment, and the reason that the payment has not heretofore been made is because of a restriction of the Comptroller General.

Mr. FADDIS. What does the resolution provide?

Mr. HOEPPEL. It provides for payment to farmers in six States of the Union who sold wheat to the Government under a fixed price. It seeks to reimburse these farmers—and some amounts are as low as $6 and $7—for interest and storage charges placed against grain while in Government storage warehouses during the World War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LAND AT VALPARAISO, FLA., FOR AVIATION FIELD, ETC.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3018) to authorize the Secretary of War to acquire by donation land at Valparaiso in Okaloosa County, Fla., for aviation field, military or other public purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. What is the bill about?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to authorize the Secretary of War to accept title to 1,460 acres of land at Valparaiso, Fla., for a military aviation bombing field and other purposes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Does it authorize an appropriation?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; the report specifically states that the acceptance of the land will entail no expense to the Government.

Mr. RICH. But this means that the Government itself after it takes the land will eventually have to maintain it.

Mr. CALDWELL. The Government will take it over as a gunnery and bombing range.

Mr. RICH. These things come in from time to time, and everyone knows that it will cost the Government some money. I object.

AMENDING CRIMINAL CODE IN ALASKA

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of S. 2867, to reenact section 463 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to define and punish crime in the District of Alaska and to provide a code of criminal procedure for said District", approved March 3, 1899, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain the bill.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the repeal of the laws of Alaska relating to intoxicating liquor, one section of the criminal code which was then thought to relate only to intoxicating liquors was repealed by mistake. It was later found that this particular section had to do with the general license taxes, levied on other lines of business and trade. We are now seeking to reenact it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. What does this provide?

Mr. DIMOND. It provides that the licenses for the prosecution of business and trade must be paid to the clerk of the court and that the clerk of the court must give a bond to the Treasurer of the United States in such sum as the Attorney General may prescribe. The bill is approved by the Department of Justice.

Mr. MILLARD. And by the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. DIMOND. Yes; the Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill out unanimously. The bill passed the Senate without objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 463 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to define and punish crime in the District of Alaska and to provide a code of criminal procedure for said District", approved March 3, 1899 (30 Stat. 1337, 1338, as amended by the act of June 6, 1900 (31 Stat. 332), is hereby reenacted; said section as reenacted reading as follows:

"SEC. 463. That the licenses provided for in this act shall be issued by the clerk of the district court or any subdivision thereof in compliance with the order of the court or judge thereof duly made and entered; and the clerk of the court shall keep a full record of all applications for license and of all recommendations for and remonstrances against the granting of licenses and of the action of the court thereon: Provided, That the clerk of said court and each division thereof shall give bond or bonds in such amount as the Secretary of the Treasury may require and in such form as the Attorney General may approve, and all moneys received for licenses by him or them under this act shall, except as otherwise provided by law, be covered into the Treasury of the United States, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 2. Any and all acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed to the extent of such conflict.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

BIDS FOR GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS, SUBJECT TO CODES

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 163, to authorize the acceptance of bids for Government contracts made subject to codes of fair competition. This bill was objected to a short time ago, but the objection has been withdrawn.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I objected a moment ago to this bill. The bill does the common-sense thing, if it is workable. My objection was because I did not think it was workable. If the gentleman wants to take that chance, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. This provides for a readjustment of contracts that have been made but are not yet under way?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is my understanding.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. It does not affect contracts under which work has actually begun?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Only those that have been left and not put into operation?

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 163

Resolved, etc., That no bid submitted prior to the enactment of this joint resolution in response to the invitation of any executive department, independent establishment, or other agency or instrumentality of the United States, the District of Columbia, or any corporation all the stock of which is owned by the United States (all of the foregoing being hereinafter designated as "agencies of the United States"), if otherwise valid and acceptable, shall be rejected because made subject to the provisions of any code or codes of fair competition, or any related requirements (as provided in Executive Order No. 6646 of Mar. 14, 1934), if the bidder, with the assent of his surety, shall agree in writing that the contract, if entered into, shall, in lieu of such code provisions or other related requirements, be subject to all acts of Congress enacted after the date of enactment of this joint resolution requiring the observance of minimum wages, maximum hours, or limitations as to age of employees in the performance of contracts with agencies of the United States. In such cases the compensation provided for in the contract shall be reduced from that stated in the bid by the amount that the contracting officer, subject to the approval of the Comptroller General, shall find the cost of performing the contract is reduced solely by reason of the contractor not complying with the provisions of such code or codes or related requirements; and the compensation for the performance of the contract shall be increased from that fixed in the contract by the amount that the contracting officer, subject to the approval of the Comptroller General, shall find the cost of performing the contract has been increased solely by reason of compliance with such subsequent acts of Congress, if any, relating to the performance of contracts with agencies of the United States.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

PUBLIC WORKS ON RIVERS AND HARBORS, ETC.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 349 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 349

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8455, a bill authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Commitee on Flood Control, the bill in its entirety shall be read for amendment, following which amendments shall be in order to any paragraph of the bill, and such amendments shall be considered under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-four Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 187]

Dietrich	Kimball	Peyser

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOLAND). Three hundred and fifty-five Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY].

I ask recognition, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a personal appeal to the Members on the Democratic side of the House to remain in their seats, in order to overcome a declared and evident filibuster on the part of the Republican side of the House which seems to be in progress without regard to the merits of the bill. I hope I may explain to you the merits of this measure that will be under consideration upon the adoption of the rule.

This measure is known as the "flood control project bill", reported by the Committee on Flood Control of the House, and contains numerous projects investigated by the engineers of the United States Army.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. I cannot refuse to yield to the gentleman from Missouri at any time.

Mr. SHORT. I am sure the gentleman realizes that not all Members on the Republican side of the aisle are filibustering.

Mr. DRIVER. Oh, no; not all. There are many Members on the Republican side of the aisle who will support this bill loyally, appreciating the real merits of the measure. If I have been general in my statement, I withdraw so much of it as included all Members on the Republican side.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. I yield.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman would permit, I would like to appeal to the membership to give close attention to the gentleman from Arkansas. The gentleman has borne the yoke for 12 years. I ask the membership to please give the gentleman respectful consideration, and he will have no difficulty in explaining the proposition, I am sure.

Mr. DRIVER. Every project in this bill has received the attention of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, under the direction of the American Congress. Many of these projects are included in a report on the streams as a whole. Not only recommendations for flood control and navigation projects, but estimates of the cost of the projects. No one project in this bill is without that investigation and without that expert recommendation.

Many of these projects were carved out of the recommendation on a whole river, and for the purpose of enabling these projects to be considered by the Works Project Administration, created for the purpose of expending the $4,800,000,000 we appropriated in the early part of the year. Following the set-up of that organization, one of the regulations made was that in all matters pertaining to river improvements there must be congressional authorization.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The money to take care of this is coming out of the $4,800,000,000?

Mr. DRIVER. Oh, yes. Nobody fools himself about the source from which the money must come in order to secure the benefit of these projects. We know that without regard to worthiness, in future Congresses the Treasury doors cannot be pried open with crow-bars. We know that our sole source of funds for these projects which we are asking the Congress to endorse in order that they be rendered eligible for consideration by the Board of Public Works must come from the moneys appropriated to it. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. In just a moment. I want the House to understand fully the position.

Now, this House recognizes the fact that the Senate earmarked $350,000,000 of that appropriation to be used for the purpose of providing flood control, river navigation, harbor works, soil erosion, and reforestation, with only a latitude of 20 percent to be added to that amount in these various activities. Today we have practically that money allocated by that Board, yet when we come in and make a plea for recognition for a project that we may present same before the Board from the fund we provided we are met with a filibuster that undertakes to murder the last prospect on the part of those interested in these projects. I say a more unfair attitude was never presented in the American Congress than that determination to obstruct this bill. There are 27 States involved in projects contained in this bill. I say there is no more unfair or unjust attitude than the attempt to close the doors to the only avenue open to these projects until every dollar has been expended for other activities.

We know the necessity of those interested in the river and harbor projects we have just endorsed and made eligible for consideration and those we now ask you to endorse for the purpose of enabling us to secure this recognition, yet they say we are engaged in a mad scramble. We yet hope to secure recognition for some of the most meritorious projects in the country.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I took this article from yesterday's Washington News:

Especially designed "pork barrel" bill up in the House today—

It was supposed to have come up yesterday—for the expenditure of $370,450,000 for flood control.

The last paragraph of the article reads:

Representative FERGUSON, Democrat, of Oklahoma, member of the Flood Control Committee which approves the bill, made a break-down by States and districts and then buttonholed each Congressman whose district would be benefited on behalf of the bill.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I will yield after I have completed my statement.

I wish to say as a member of the Flood Control Committee that I have been very much interested in the things the Flood Control Committee has been doing during this session of Congress. I realize fully that the chairman of the committee [Mr. WILSON] has worked very zealously and very hard to give consideration to any Member of Congress who wanted to come before the committee with any bill. I do not believe there has been a more generous chairman than the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] in granting hearings. His attitude has been one of fairness toward every Member of Congress. The fact of the matter is that he has given his time to listen to any project any Member of Congress wanted to bring before the committee, and I tender the gentleman my congratulations for the generous consideration that he has given Members of Congress.

Let me call your attention to what has been considered with relation to flood control during this session of Congress. In the bill giving the President power to expend $4,800,000,000, $235,000,000 was allocated for the purpose of flood control, and the President was given the power to increase that amount by 20 percent if we wished to, which would make at least an additional $47,000,000, or a total of $272,000,000.

The Flood Control Committee made the request of the President of the United States that we increase that amount to $600,000,000. In the bill (H. R. 8833) providing for the construction of dams in the West in order to assist flood control there was authorized the expenditure of $126,719,000, and I presume would have been passed by the House before this but for the fact that the committee could not agree and the bill had not been reported out of the committee. I have some reason to believe, however, that if we do not adjourn tonight we may get it out tomorrow. Then, we have the pending bill authorizing $370,450,000, and I understand amendments will be offered to the bill which, if adopted, will add an additional $74,000,000, making a total of $444,450,000. Not only must the States furnish rights-of-way for the construction of these flood-control works which will cost about $130,000,000 to the States. I would like to ask the Members of Congress, when you consider all the projects that have been authorized for flood control—it will require over $1,100,000,000—where are we going to get the money? It seems to me we have made wonderful progress in asking for funds to be spent for the purpose of flood control. You have already appropriated over $10,000,000,000 in this Congress. Why? Why? Pork barrel. Pork barrel.

I wish to congratulate the President of the United States for his message this morning vetoing the so-called "Mississippi set-back levee bill." I think it was a very fine piece of work on his part in the interest of the American citizen, and I congratulate the President on his action.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman passes to his next topic, I should like to ask him a question pertinent to the question he has just asked; that is, where we were going to get the money.

Mr. RICH. While I did not want to yield to anybody until I completed my statement, this might be a personal question and I will grant the gentleman this one privilege, but I do not want to grant any more.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman will agree with me on this, I am sure, that the $4,000,000,000 is going to be spent.

Mr. RICH. I would say to the gentleman that I do not think the President is ever going to spend $4,000,000,000. I think he is going to come in here about a year from now and tell us he has saved $2,000,000,000 of that money and say: "What a wonderful thing I have accomplished." I think the gentleman will be very badly fooled if he thinks the President of the United States is going to spend all that money. I do not think it is possible; I do not know where or how he will get the money, and if he does not spend it I will take my hat off to him again, and congratulate him.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit another question? Assuming that it is going to be spent, and I assume that it is, and I feel that a majority of the Members on the gentleman's side of the House believe it will be spent, notwithstanding his opinion, the question then arises whether it should be spent for useful and permanent purposes or useless and temporary purposes. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to spend this money for flood-control dams than for boondoggling and things of that sort?

Mr. RICH. I will say to the gentleman that if the money is to be spent, I believe it should be spent for worthy projects, but before I finish I will point out how this is the biggest "pork barrel" bill that has come before Congress since I have been a Member. The Secretary of War has not approved these projects and if you read the bill it will show that 139 of these projects have never been reported to Congress. If items are to be allowed in a bill of this kind, just for the reason that Members of Congress want money spent in their own districts without regards for the greatest good and need, because they want to be returned to Congress for their ability to have the money of the taxpayers spent in their districts, then I claim this is a "pork barrel" bill; and it is the biggest "pork barrel" bill that has come before Congress since I have been a Member.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I may say to the gentleman that while I am not familiar with all the projects in the bill I am familiar with one project in the bill, which has been approved three times by the Board of Army Engineers, although not reported to Congress. I refer to Caddoa Dam on the Arkansas River in Colorado.

Mr. RICH. I do not claim that every project comes in the category of which I speak, but 139 have not been approved by the Board of Army Engineers. I would accept those projects that the Army engineers would recommend for flood control, but I cannot recommend any project any Member of Congress recommends.

No report has been made to the Congress by the Army Engineers on 139 projects, and I say that the Army Engineers are not in favor of this bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania make a talk the other day against the river-and-harbor bill which carried an appropriation of over $600,000,000, the most notorious "pork barrel" type of legislation of all legislation?

Mr. RICH. I was one who held that bill up for 3 weeks, but I could not hold it up longer or I should have done so.

I was opposed to it just as much as the gentleman from Colorado or any other Member. I think we are spending money foolishly, and when we get through with this session of Congress the people back home will say of the Members of Congress who have been spending this money so foolishly: "You did one of the worst jobs that has ever been accomplished in all the history of America." I hope the majority of you never get back here again. You await their verdict.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I believe our little colloquy is enlightening to the House. I am sure the gentleman's part of it is. I want to ask him another question.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman is going to use all of my time.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. RICH. This will have to be the last one.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman will recall that the greatest objection made to the $4,000,000,000 appropriation bill when we passed it in the House was it was not earmarked and that it was just a blanket authority to the administration to spend the money as it saw fit. Does not the gentleman think we ought to take advantage of the opportunity to earmark the expenditure of this money, and that is what we are doing here, earmarking it for a most useful and urgent purpose?

Mr. RICH. I am glad the gentleman brought that question up. This bill is not going to earmark anything, because the President is going to spend the money only for projects recommended by the Army engineers. He is not going to pay any attention to the Members of Congress. You who have followed him since this session started will find later that he is going to turn you down and tramp on you. You will not get the recognition you thought you would get. He is going to pay attention to the Army engineers exclusively and not Members of Congress—at least that is what I hope he will do.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I am very fond of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but he is not entirely fair. Every time I ask him a question he makes a regular speech.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, take the report that is submitted with reference to this bill. It will be noted in the second paragraph that the projects selected in this measure have been approved by the Corps of Engineers as the most meritorious of a great number of undertakings upon which studies and examinations have been made. May I say to the Members of Congress that that information and statement are not altogether correct, if I interpret the meaning correctly. As I would interpret that statement, it is that the Army engineers have approved all of these projects. Now, I have personally taken this matter up with the Army engineers, and I find no one in the office of the Corps of Engineers who has approved this bill, and they will not approve it. I am giving you that information on my word of honor. I secured this information from the Army engineers yesterday. No Member of the House can refute it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Did they approve any of the projects in this bill? Did they report favorably on the projects?

Mr. RICH. No; they did not. I will give the gentleman this information in a few minutes.

Mr. Speaker, so far as this statement is concerned, the Army engineer says the report that they gave to our committee was informative information and not specific. No thought was given as to the relative values of the projects, as to their greatest needs, or as to where the money should be spent specifically for flood control.

I think that we as Members of Congress should give consideration to the fact that when the Flood Control Committee considered this bill the chairman of the committee made the request of each individual who submitted a proposition as to whether the project would give employment and whether it would be able to be started at once. Those were the two most formidable questions asked by the chairman of the committee: Will you be able to start this work at once? Will it give employment to labor? If they replied yes, every one of these projects were added to the bill, not excepting one, because the information was given that they would employ labor and they could be started at once. If anyone submitted a project to this committee and stated it would give immediate employment to labor, then the committee added it to the bill.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that the gentleman himself probably proposed as many of these projects that were not recommended and had them included in this bill as any other Member?

Mr. RICH. That is a good question, and I am glad the gentleman brought it up. I wanted to see how easy it was to get something in this bill.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will make his speech and stop yielding for questions, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, the question has been asked why I had three projects submitted for my district. I wanted to see how easy it was to get a project put into this bill. I made the request without any explanation at all, and these projects went through. I do not believe that any of the projects in this bill should be adopted without the Army engineers recommending them. The membership of the committee asked me if I would then be in favor of the bill. I said no; I would do everything I possibly could to defeat this bill. That is the reason I added those projects in my district to the bill, if that answers the gentleman's question.

Now, I want to show where this money is going, so that we will be able to see how our colleagues have been going around trying to get votes for this bill.

In Vermont there are 4 projects, costing $344,000.
Massachusetts, 1 project, $43,000.
New York, 1 project, $43,000.
New York and Pennsylvania combined, 1 project, $6,479,000.
Pennsylvania, 15 projects, costing $21,885,000.
Ohio, 1 project, to cost $192,000.
The District of Columbia, 1 project, to cost $571,000.
Maryland, 1 project, to cost $743,000.
West Virginia, 6 projects, to cost $15,318,000.
Kentucky, 4 projects, to cost $6,078,000.
Indiana, 28 projects, to cost $10,445,000.
Washington, 12 projects, to cost $14,110,000.
Illinois, 61 projects, to cost $26,503,000.
California, 2 projects, to cost $79,607,000.
Alabama, 4 projects, to cost $835,000.
Florida, 1 project, to cost $132,000.
Mississippi, 6 projects, to cost $3,160,000.
Georgia, 3 projects, to cost $1,555,000.
Louisiana, 13 projects, to cost $4,899,000.
Texas, 3 projects, to cost $16,459,000.
New Mexico, 1 project, to cost $8,691,000.
Arkansas, 28 projects, to cost $62,605.
Missouri, 19 projects, to cost $19,730,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RICH. May I ask the gentleman to yield me sufficient time to put the rest of this statement in the RECORD?

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. Oklahoma, 17 projects, to cost $45,660,000.
Colorado, 4 projects, to cost $8,076,000.
Kansas, 28 projects, to cost $15,406,000.
Iowa, 4 projects, to cost $308,000.
Wisconsin, 1 project, to cost $29,000.
Minnesota, 1 project, to cost $464,000.
Montana, 4 projects, to cost $157,000.
North Dakota, 2 projects, to cost $68,000.
South Dakota, 2 projects, to cost $1,139,000.

If, for any reason, I have made any error in the statement of these figures, it is because I figured them up myself without an adding machine, and I will stand corrected if any gentleman wants to correct me on them.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a correction in his statement?

Mr. RICH. I have not the time. I may say there are 32 States represented in this pork-barrel bill.

I believe, when we come right down seriously to think of the money that has been allocated for this purpose under this flood-control bill and when we consider that the President has sufficient authority already granted him, we may assume that he will use his judgment in allowing these projects that have been recommended by the Army engineers to be constructed; and if you are going to leave it up to him to do this work, then there is no use of passing this pork-barrel bill, because if we pass this bill here today these projects will be on record, and the Membership of the House can go to the Committee on Appropriations for the next 10 or 15 years and try to get appropriations to complete them.

I request that if you are going to save this country, stop this flood of money being spent, unless it is to be spent judiciously, honestly, and meritoriously.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], a member of the Flood Control Committee, seems to be concerned about this bill because he calls it a "pork barrel" bill. So far as I am concerned, I am in favor of "pork barrel" bills where they carry proper projects that allocate the various projects all over the United States where the benefits can accrue not to one particular community, but to the various communities.

All of these projects have been surveyed by the Army. The data have been submitted to the Committee on Flood Control. They have considered the data with reference to the merits of the projects and have incorporated in this bill, as widespread as possible, the geographic benefits that will be derived from meritorious projects.

This is the kind of general-welfare legislation I favor and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, regardless of his recent remarks, himself a member of the committee, submitted three propositions to the committee which have not been accepted by the Army or the Navy as projects that would bring greater benefits than their costs, but because of the unemployment condition in these particular sections of Pennsylvania, just as exists in other sections of the United States, the committee incorporated the three projects offered as amendments by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in this bill, namely, Lock Haven, $2,200,000, suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Jersey Shore, Pa., $304,500, suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], not approved especially by the Army Engineers, but at his suggestion, because of unemployment and other conditions, incorporated like the others in this bill.

Also, another project at Muncy, of $277,000, making a total of $3,881,000 of projects that were put in this bill by the committee at the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I am like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I have only a little time and the gentleman has made his speech.

The only objection I have is that the gentleman should not get up here and criticize other Members of the House for having their arms in the pork barrel when the gentleman has his arms in the barrel up to the shoulder.

I do not want to make any unwarranted criticism of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but these projects are proposed not because they are recommended entirely by the Army Engineers but in connection with the fact that they are worthy and meritorious projects and will decrease unemployment.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. TABER. The only reason they are put in the bill is that they want to give the Members what they want rather than what they need.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I do not agree with that statement; they are all necessary for flood control. They have been selected with care as work projects that have merit.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know of any other Public Works projects throughout the United States where they are merely for unemployment?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Any time that Congress passes a public-building bill or a bill like this that will furnish work to the unemployed and Congress believes the projects are worthy, why has not Congress the right to make such a declaration? Floods are a menace to property, health, and life. No State or local community can meet the problem. The Federal Government should help to solve this problem.

Mr. SNELL. And to employ men at the rate of $1,150.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Eighty percent of the cost of these projects will go into man power, and that is a high percentage, and makes the projects as eligible under the unemployment plans for wide-spread assistance to the unemployed.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman make that statement with reference to the river and harbor work?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I am not talking about the river and harbor work, I am talking about flood control. More than 80 percent goes into man power. These are ideal work projects for the men unemployed and on relief.

Mr. HALLECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. Am I to understand that the money for these projects will come from that already appropriated for the Public Works Administration rather than out of the Treasury?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes, Congress will here declare these projects as approved and eligible for specific allocation out of W. P. A. funds. These particular projects are for the consideration of the committee that is to allocate the amounts out of the $4,000,000,000 appropriation.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. Has the Public Works Administration the right to authorize these projects?

Mr. GREENWOOD. If we pass this bill it is a declaration of policy that Congress believes they are meritorious projects. The public-works committee can follow this authorization by specifically approving the projects, knowing Congress has declared its approval of such action.

Mr. BOILEAU. And if we pass this bill, would it be mandatory on the administration?

Mr. GREENWOOD. It would not be mandatory, but it is a declaration of policy, putting our approval on the projects.

Mr. BOILEAU. If they could do it without this legislation and if the legislation does not compel them to do so, what in the name of common sense is the use of passing this bill?

Mr. GREENWOOD. This is an authorization. It will declare to this committee that we have approved it. If they do not approve it, Congress has the power then to make an appropriation to carry it into effect at the next session. I trust the public works committee shall adopt the projects to be constructed out of the $4,000,000,000 appropriation.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. As a Member with voting responsibility, I want the gentleman's opinion as to whether or not this bill adds anything to the debt burden of the United States.

Mr. GREENWOOD. It would not add a dollar to the $4,000,000,000 and more that we have already appropriated, but would declare as a policy our approval of these particular projects for the committee that is allocating those funds.

Mr. HOUSTON. And if the Army Engineers O. K. one of these projects, and Mr. Hopkins turns it down, where are we then?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Congress then at a later date, if this bill passes, can make a specific appropriation if it sees fit.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. DRIVER. Under the regulations of the P. W. A. not a project there is eligible for consideration until Congress does approve it.

Mr. GREENWOOD. By this bill we give our approval to these various projects, based on the data given by the Army engineers, coupled with other data of giving employment to the unemployed. Surely the Congress that appropriates the $4,000,000,000 has a right to follow that up with this kind of a bill or with a public-buildings bill that will declare our approval of certain specific projects.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, in opening the debate on this rule, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DRIVER] stated there was a filibuster against the bill on the Republican side of the House, and further that, in his opinion, most of the Republicans were against the bill. I do not believe that either statement is correct.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. Yes.

Mr. DRIVER. The information I have came from the minority leader.

Mr. MOTT. I do not believe there is a filibuster here.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I object to the filibuster proposition. I am opposed to this bill, and I think I have a right to oppose it all the way down, but it is not a question of a filibuster.

Mr. DRIVER. I shall take just a little time to say to the minority leader that I appreciate thoroughly his frankness and the courtesy he offered me, but in deference to the statement made by the gentleman I feel it is my duty to make this statement.

Mr. SNELL. I shall take what responsibility comes to me. I am opposed to the bill, but I am not filibustering.

Mr. DRIVER. The gentleman told me that he would exercise every parliamentary procedure to defeat the bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Oregon 2 minutes more.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is a filibuster here, and I do not consider this is a party matter at all. Flood-control projects from all parts of the United States are included in this authorization bill. It includes flood-control projects and very valuable ones in my own State. It is pretty well settled, I think, that the money to finance these projects is going to come out of the $4,000,000,000 Public Works bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman states that this is going to come out of that $4,000,000,000. What evidence has the gentleman to substantiate that statement, or has anyone else?

Mr. MOTT. It is only my opinion, of course, that this will come out of that sum, as will all of the other Public Works projects authorized at this session, whether they be for flood control, rivers and harbors, or roads. The money to finance them is expected to come out of the $4,000,000,000 public-works bill. Now, I do not believe that money appropriated under that $4,000,000,000 bill can be any more profitably or beneficially expended than in flood control, in river and harbor projects, and in roads. [Applause.] If we had earmarked and spent two-thirds of the entire amount on projects of the three classes I have named, we would be a great deal better off than we are at the present time.

I have had some experience here in passing flood-control authorization bills in this and in the preceding session. I believe at this session of Congress I have succeeded in putting through about a dozen different flood control examination bills for streams in my own district. In fact, I think every major stream in my district has been taken care of in this regard. From my experience in legislation of this kind and from my experience with the Board of Army Engineers, I want to say that when the Army engineers approve a project, whether it is flood control or rivers and harbors, then no one can doubt that the project is a proper one, and that there is no pork barrel connected with it. I think a majority of the Members here are for this bill. I personally am for it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has again expired.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were ayes 132 and noes 80.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 239, nays 112, answered "present" 1, not voting 78, as follows:

SEC. 7. This act may be cited as the "Supplemental Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1936."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to take but 5 minutes, because we want to pass this bill and send it to the Senate so that there cannot be any excuse on the part of the Senate that the House was not ready to adjourn whenever they are ready to adjourn.

The estimates that entered into the making of this bill were $94,373,337.88. The amount recommended by the committee for passage is $92,961,299.74, or a reduction of $1,776,038.14 under the estimates.

I want to call your attention to the fact that there is only $9,844.06 of deficiency items in this bill. There is $246,716 for judgments and authorized claims. There is $382,450 for supplemental items not due to new laws of this session. All the balance of it, amounting to $93,322,289.68, is due to new legislation passed by this session of Congress. If it had not been for that new legislation we would not have to make this appropriation. The principal part of it is due to the Social Security Act, for which we provide $73,868,000 to make grants to the States. We could not cut that. This appropriation bill carries those grants on a 75-percent basis of the authorization on the theory that 3 months will have passed by the time the act can be put into practical effect. Therefore, we cut it down 25 percent, in accordance with the Budget estimates.

We reduced the administrative expenses to carry this law into effect by $1,118,750. We cut those expenses because we are determined that they should not build up great unnecessary overhead organizations. Let them grow gradually as their experience demands that they need additional help.

Now, just a few words and I am finished. I asked for suspension of the rules to pass this bill so that the amount could not be increased by amendments. This Congress has passed authorizations for a great many appropriations running into hundreds of millions of dollars. Amendments to appropriate for these authorizations would have been in order under the general rules of the House. We have appropriated enough money at this session.

From information available at this stage of the session concerning bills carrying appropriations, we have enacted, or will have enacted by the time we shall have adjourned, appropriations estimated at approximately $7,550,000,000; to this must be added $2,200,000,000 for the permanent appropriations which occur each year without annual action by Congress, and the sum of $500,000,000 made available for relief from funds of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, making a grand total of $10,250,000,000. This sum covers all appropriations, including those from the postal and other special revenues, and from trust-fund receipts as well as those from the sinking fund and interest on the debt. It has in it the work-relief measure we enacted this session of $4,000,000,000 of new appropriations and $500,000,000 from R. F. C. funds, a total of $4,500,000,000.

That sum was made available for expenditure until June 30, 1937, or for two fiscal years. Eliminating this from consideration there is a residue of $5,750,000,000 in which is included a considerable amount due to emergency appropriations for relief in this period of economic distress. However, in addition to the appropriations there is, as I have previously stated, a host of new authorizations calling for appropriations that will be pressing upon us in the future—some of them mandatory, such as the pension bill involving $45,000,000, for which no funds will need to be provided at this session. But the total is too high.

Perhaps while we are discussing the total of appropriations for the session, I should make it clear that they should not be confused with the expenditures for any particular fiscal year. I do not mean to say that $10,000,000,000 is to be the measure of our expenditures for the fiscal year 1936, which we are now in. It will be far less than that because appropriations frequently are expendable over a period of several fiscal years, and some of those made at this session are for the fiscal year just closed, but the total of appropriations for the session is a potential charge against Government revenue of one kind and another for the particular fiscal year in which they are actually disbursed. The appropriations must be reduced.

Standing here today in the presence of my colleagues, praying for divine aid, I hope at the next session of Congress that this House will join hands with me and others and curtail the appropriations so that we will have an economical Government and not put an extra burden upon the taxpayers by increasing the national debt. Let us balance the Budget by retrenchment in expenditures and not otherwise. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. I simply want to ask the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations one question. I understand the gentleman's committee reduced the Budget estimate on the National Labor Relations Board by $116,000?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Ninety-six thousand dollars.

Mr. CONNERY. Is it my understanding that if they can show at the beginning of next session that these textile Labor Board cases have been turned over to them and they can show that they need all of the money which the Budget estimated at this time, they will get it?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I may state to the gentleman in reply to his question that they can adjust these labor disputes as calls on them are made, and if it is necessary to make more appropriations for their adjustment, it is my intention to make the appropriation.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I did not quite understand what the gentleman from Texas said about the amount of money that had been appropriated by this session of the Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN. About $10,250,000,000, if you include the permanent appropriations.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman means by this session of Congress?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; is there any objection?

Mr. MAY. Yes; very much.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I join the gentleman.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Under the judgments of the Court of Claims is there included the claim of the Quanah Cotton Oil Co.?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not know whether it is included or not, but it is if it has been certified by the court.

Mr. McFARLANE. It was one of those certified.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. Did I understand the gentleman to ask the Members of the House to join hands in stopping these excessive appropriations?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I did.

Mr. DINGELL. I am wondering if the gentleman will stand hitched on that when we are asked again to give blanket authority to somebody to spend $4,000,000,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Did the gentleman ever know of an instance when the gentleman from Texas did not stand hitched when he said he would?

Mr. DINGELL. I have known instances, Mr. Speaker, in which gentlemen have been invited to the White House and have changed their opinion.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That may be; every man has the right to change his opinion.

Mr. DINGELL. I am asking the gentleman if he will go along with what he said to newspapermen about 6 weeks ago?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am confirming that now. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this bill itself calls for about $93,000,000. It is not so much money as has been appropriated in some of the other bills we have been bringing in here; but, as the chairman of the committee has told you, this bill along with the other appropriation bills that have been passed at this session, including the permanent and indefinite appropriations which come without action of the Appropriations Committee or without specific annual appropriations by Congress, amount to a total of $10,350,000,000. Now, this is a figure to ponder on. We must stop this kind of appropriation, for the only other alternative is complete bankruptcy of the country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For my own satisfaction and to get this thing perfectly straight, did the gentleman say that at this session of Congress we have appropriated more than $10,000,000,000?

Mr. TABER. We have appropriated $10,350,000,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the gentleman any figures as to how much additional money we have authorized to be appropriated?

Mr. TABER. No, I have not; but I know that in addition to previous allotments we have authorized over $300,000,000 on rivers and harbors, and we have hanging here today under a rule that has been adopted a scheme which, if it is carried through according to what I understand are the intentions of the proponents, will add $500,000,000 more to the authorization.

I hope the Congress will take a lesson from this situation. We have, including the postal revenues and the processing taxes in sight, as far as I can see, a little less than $4,500,000,000 of revenue. This subtracted from $10,350,000,000 means almost $7,000,000,000 of appropriations beyond the capacity of the Government to pay. This has got to stop!

In the appropriations included in the pending bill is one item of a little better than $60,000 for the State Department, and to this item I desire particularly to call your attention. It is an item to promote those foolish reciprocal trade agreements which were authorized by a resolution passed a year or 2 years ago. Those things are getting us into trouble with our own domestic situation. On the 10th of September 1934 a treaty of this kind was entered into with Cuba. The effect of this treaty and other operations of the Roosevelt administration, let me tell you, was to reduce the duty on sugar from Cuba from 2 cents to nine-tenths of a cent, very largely for the benefit of the National City Bank and some other large corporations which own the Cuban sugar plantations. As a result of that operation Cuba has imported into the United States $86,000,000 in 9 months, whereas in the 9 months prior to that proposition they imported only $46,000,000. This represents an increase of $40,000,000 of imports, and this, too, at the expense of the farmers of the Middle and Northwest who raise sugar beets.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the gentleman know that while raw sugar sold in 1912 at 57 cents per 100 pounds f. o. b. New York, that the price during the last few days has been $3.45 per hundred?

Mr. TABER. Every time you turn your sugar production over to the Cuban sugar operators they are able to manipulate the situation so as to get more money out of the consumers of the United States. This is the history of the Cuban sugar situation.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CARPENTER. I note another item in this bill for the Department of State, beginning in line 15, page 17, and reading:

> Purchase of necessary books and documents; newspapers and periodicals; stationery; official cards; printing and binding; entertainment; hire, maintenance, and operation of motor-propelled passenger vehicles; and such other expenses as may be actually and necessarily incurred by the Government of the United States by reason of such invitation in the observance of proper courtesies.

I am opposed to this. Will the gentleman explain the item?

Mr. TABER. I cannot explain it. It is one of those junkets such as are passed by the House. I hope the gentleman will help us prevent the passage of bills providing any more of these junkets.

In order to get $40,000,000 of imports of Cuban sugar, we have increased our trade in the last 9 months as against the previous 9 months in the way of exports to Cuba from $30,000,000 to $42,000,000. In order to let Cuba bring in $40,000,000 we get the privilege of sending $12,000,000. That is a good Roosevelt trade.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. Did not Cuba send a group of goodwill people over here to thank the President?

Mr. TABER. Yes. The National City Bank should thank the President, too. This was all for their benefit.

May I say further that whenever we enter into a treaty with another country besides Cuba, the result of the treaty has been that if we gave any privilege to that other country with reference to imports into this country, in order to get an advantage there, we had to give, under the construction that Secretary Hull has put on it, the same privilege to every other country in the world. So that when we made a deal with Belgium and got a little advantage on some things and reduced our duty on cement, the Netherlands demanded the same advantage and sent in just as much cement duty free.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. This would be a good time to repeal this reciprocal-tariff provision?

Mr. TABER. Yes. I am opposed to the reciprocal tariff. I do not believe in putting up any more money to fool around with in connection with promoting such ridiculous performances.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is there not a statement in the press today that the President's advisory committee urges a continuance of that reciprocal tariff?

Mr. TABER. I understand so.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will that not lead to worse conditions than those in existence today?

Mr. TABER. The administration wants worse conditions. They have no other explanation for the performances they are pulling off.

Mr. TREADWAY. Can the gentleman offer any hope for the textile industry of New England if that condition continues?

Mr. TABER. No; nor for any other industry in our country. I offer no hope to the beet-sugar farmers of the Northwest; nor can I offer any hope to the dairy farmer, because right now there is in process of negotiation treaties with the Netherlands and treaties with Canada designed to open wide the markets of the United States for dairy products. I hope the farmers will wake up and realize what is being done to them.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to another matter and I want the people from the agricultural districts to understand this. The duty upon agricultural products that came in here in 1933 averaged 76.1 percent. The duty on manufactured products and other things of that kind in 1933 averaged 37.6 percent. In 1934 the duty on agricultural products was reduced to 53.7 percent because of the effect of the importation of sugar at half the duty they used to pay, the duty being reduced from $67,000,000 down to $43,000,000.

The duty on other products, like manufactured products, increased from 37 percent to 41 percent, because the increase in importations of $140,000,000 on wines and spirits and the increase in duty on those things was an 80-percent rate, which brought the average up. It is not really manufactured products.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF. In connection with the duty on sugar, may I say that the duty has been reduced from 2 cents per pound to nine-tenths of a cent per pound?

Mr. TABER. That is exactly what they did.

Mr. WOODRUFF. And that constitutes a handsome gift to people living in New York who own, control, and operate Cuban sugar facilities.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER].

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Secretary of Agriculture enjoys today more attention at the hands of the press than any other member of the Cabinet. Ridicule has been heaped upon him from all sides with respect to the inconsistencies present in connection with the agricultural program. I feel that in the turmoil and stress of the closing hours of this Congress we should direct attention to that part of this deficiency bill which provides for a still further payment for agricultural experimentation. Included in this $92,000,000 is $13,000,000 for Secretary Wallace to play further with the agricultural affairs of the country. Experiments, investigations, analyses, and all other means at his command are to be used in order that the money of the taxpayers may be spent to further the jobs for those under his care.

It might be interesting to note that in addition to the $13,000,000 provided for in the present deficiency bill there has already been provided for this program of experimentation the sum of $30,386,123 during the current year. This is to be used for soil conservation, for soil erosion, for reclamation, for resettlement, and for all of those other fantastic schemes by which the Secretary of Agriculture promises to solve the problems of the farmer. In spite of this pork-barrel program involving $43,000,000 for experimental extravagance, we were called upon last week to curtail the potato crops and to make it a crime to sell more than a few bushels of potatoes.

I believe that the acting floor leader on the Democratic side of the House enjoys the confidence and the esteem of every Member. I cannot help but direct the attention of the House to a rather cryptic remark made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] during the course of the hearings on this appropriation measure. In reference to a certain statement made by a representative of the Agricultural Department when he came before the committee to justify this request for $13,000,000, the acting floor leader on the Democratic side denied the correctness of the assertion made by the representative and termed the allegation as "imagination."

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] characterized the opinion of the specialist in these words: "That is pure imagination." This is on page 113 of the record of the hearing. If it is pure imagination with respect to the particular opinion which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] referred to at that time, I believe this whole program of millions and millions of dollars for experimentation can likewise be characterized as fantastic and imaginative.

We are just as bad off in agriculture today as we were a few years ago. On the Democratic side of the House just yesterday two of the Members engaged in a colloquy with respect to differences of opinion growing out of the agricultural program. Charges were made that the prices of pork are too high. Disturbances in one of the western cities were pointed out as an evidence of the difficulties that we encounter. Housewives are bringing to our attention continually the mounting cost of foodstuffs. The income of the wage earner has not increased proportionately, and all this is done in order that experimentation, in order that fantastic schemes may be tried by those in authority at the expense of the American taxpayer.

This Congress will be labeled as a "$10,000,000,000 Congress", and of that amount a great part is nothing more or less than a waste of the taxpayer's money. You and I have the charge upon us to go back home and answer the charge of profligacy, waste, and extravagance which has characterized this session.

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I shall be very happy to yield.

Mr. MORITZ. Did not President Hoover spend much money?

Mr. DITTER. No; I feel my answer to that question should be this: I have a great deal of confidence in the distinguished Chairman of the Appropriations Committee. I feel I breach no confidence when I say that he directed the attention of the committee to the extravagances in which we have indulged, and specifically bound himself to the declaration that this program of profligacy must be discontinued if the credit of the Nation is to be maintained.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I shall be happy to yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The gentleman is speaking on this $13,000,000 appropriation for soil conservation. Has the gentleman ever seen one of these projects undertaken by the Soil Conservation Service?

Mr. DITTER. I have seen them and I in no way question the value of those programs which may lead to conservation, but I denounce a policy of inconsistency by which soil conservation is advanced in one breath and the fruits of the soil in the other breath are brought to destruction.

Mr. FERGUSON. Then the gentleman is not objecting to the appropriation for that purpose?

Mr. DITTER. I am objecting to a program rather than to a specific item. I object to that part of the item which includes extravagant experimentation and fantastic schemes and inconsistent policies.

Mr. FERGUSON. There is no resettlement program included in this.

Mr. DITTER. As I read the hearings, included in the $13,000,000 or at least in the $43,000,000, there is part of the fund for the resettlement program.

Mr. FERGUSON. But not in this $13,000,000 appropriation.

Mr. DITTER. They are all in one group.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman from Pennsylvania object to the soil conservation service conducted in the western part of Pennsylvania?

Mr. DITTER. As I say, I have not objected to soil conservation, I am objecting to a spirit of inconsistency.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I am asking the gentleman the question.

Mr. DITTER. And I am pointing out the very sound policy of the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the motion.

The question was taken and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

House Resolution 361 was also laid on the table.

PUBLIC-UTILITY HOLDING-COMPANY BILL

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. RAYBURN: I move that the managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill S. 2796 be, and they are hereby, instructed to agree to the following amendment to section 11 (b) of the Senate bill: In lieu of said section 11 (b) insert the following:

"(b) It shall be the duty of the Commission, as soon as practicable after January 1, 1938:

"(1) To require by order, after notice and opportunity for hearing, that each holding company, and each subsidiary company thereof, shall take such action as the Commission shall find necessary to limit the operations of the holding-company system of which such company is a part to a single integrated public-utility system, and to such other businesses as are reasonably incidental, or economically necessary or appropriate to the operation of such integrated public-utility system. Provided, however, that the Commission shall permit a registered holding company to continue to control one or more additional public-utility systems, if, after notice and opportunity for hearing, it finds that—

"(A) Each of such additional systems cannot be operated as an independent system without the loss of substantial economies which can be secured by the retention of control by such holding company of such system;

"(B) All of such additional systems are located in one State, or in adjoining States, or in a contiguous foreign country; and

"(C) The continued combination of such systems under the control of such holding company is not so large (considering the state of the art and the area or region affected) as to impair the advantages of localized management, efficient operation, or the effectiveness of regulation.

"The Commission may permit as reasonably incidental, or economically necessary or appropriate to the operations of one or more integrated public-utility systems the retention of an interest in any business (other than the business of a public-utility company as such) which the Commission shall find necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers and not detrimental to the proper functioning of such system or systems.

"(2) To require by order, after notice and opportunity for hearing, that each registered holding company, and each subsidiary company thereof, shall take such steps as the Commission shall find necessary to insure that the corporate structure or continued existence of any company in the holding-company system does not unduly or unnecessarily complicate the structure, or unfairly or inequitably distribute voting power among security holders, of such holding-company system. In carrying out the provisions of this paragraph the Commission shall require each registered holding company (and any company in the same holding system with such holding company) to take such action as the Commission shall find necessary in order that such holding company shall cease to be a holding company with respect to each of its subsidiary companies which itself has a subsidiary which is a holding company. Except for the purpose of fairly and equitably distributing voting power among the security holders of such company, nothing in this paragraph shall authorize the Commission to require any change in the corporate structure or existence of any company which is not a holding company, or of any company whose principal business is that of a public-utility company.

"The Commission may by order revoke or modify any order previously made under this subsection if after notice and opportunity for hearing it finds that the conditions upon which the order was predicated do not exist. Any order made under this subsection shall be subject to judicial review as provided in section 24."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, this motion, if privileged at all, is privileged under House Rule 1–A, the 20-day rule. It will be remembered that some days ago, 20 days having elapsed after the appointment of conferees under the rule, this matter was brought up and a motion was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] to instruct conferees. That motion was rejected. Thereupon, another motion was made to instruct the conferees and the motion was agreed to.

The view which I present is that by that action the force of the 20-day rule was exhausted. The bolt was shot—its force and effect is spent—and no motion can be again made under that rule.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that if this motion can be made today it could have been made at any time since the prior action by the House. Also, that if this motion can be made now, it being the second motion to instruct after a motion to instruct has been passed by the House, an unlimited number of motions to instruct can be made. In short, if this motion is privileged, a motion can be made every day to instruct conferees; it can be made every hour in every day. Manifestly, in the adoption of the rule it was never contemplated that any such multiplicity of motions should be made. Therefore, we are driven to the conclusion that only a single motion, when it is passed, can be made within the 20-day rule.

The rule provides that the motion may be either to "discharge", to "instruct", or to "appoint" new conferees. The authorization is disjunctive so that all three motions cannot be made. Each of the three motions is made of equal quality. Manifestly, not more than one motion to "discharge" or to "appoint" can be passed. The same limit is placed on the number of motions to "instruct", is placed upon motions to "discharge" and to "appoint." When a single motion to do either is adopted no other motion to do the same thing is privileged.

Mr. Speaker, a motion to instruct the conferees can be made only under 2 conditions—1 under the 20-day rule, and the other under the 6-day rule before the close of the session.

The latter cannot now be made because no one knows that this session will close in 6 days. No time for adjournment has been agreed upon. We must, therefore, proceed on the basis that Congress will remain in session indefinitely. So there is no room for the application for the 6-day rule.

The only basis for considering this motion as privileged is under the 20-day rule, and it is so manifestly unreasonable and extravagant to hold that a multiplicity of motions may be made that I think this motion must be held not privileged.

The gentleman from Texas has no status to make the motion that does not attach to any other Member of the House. If the gentleman from Texas may make the motion any other Member can make it. The mere fact that he is one of the conferees gives him no superior status to make the motion. He makes it in his capacity as a Member of the House.

Therefore, anyone could make the motion, and immediately upon its adoption another Member may rise and move to instruct the conferees. After the House passes on his motion some other Member can rise and so on indefinitely may Members make motions until the whole time of the House is consumed by motions to instruct the conferees.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, when the Speaker last ruled some days ago that it was not required that conferees be recalcitrant in order to make a motion to instruct them, to my mind that decision in a way determined that a motion to instruct the conferees could be made and offered by any Member of the House who saw fit to make it and as often as any Member desired to make such a motion. Of course, the gentleman from Alabama is unduly alarmed, because that will probably never happen. But it is true under the rule the motion could be made as often as anybody saw fit to make it.

Unless we put a limitation in a rule there is no limitation. For instance, we put in our rules "one motion to recommit", and again "when a bill is objected to it goes off the calendar", not to be placed on there again, and there are other similar limitations expressed in our rules, the ordinary interpretation being that without any express limitation in the rule there is no limitation, and a motion can be made as often as any Member desires to make it.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the point of order. Here is one time when I find myself in agreement with the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] is correct in his contention, then this 20-day rule is a nullity, or can be annulled by any member who is opposed to a measure by instruction to the conferees. Suppose that the gentleman from Alabama is correct in his contention, that when one motion to instruct conferees is made, the rule goes dead. A bill is sent to conference, and someone who does not want the bill, who is an enemy to the entire legislation, rises in his place and moves to instruct the conferees along lines nobody wants. If the contention of the gentleman from Alabama is correct, that would forever preclude any other Member of the House from moving to instruct those conferees in the future. Besides, I call attention to the fact that if a veto message, we will say, from the President of the United States comes in and is referred to a committee, any Member of the House has a right at any time to rise and move to discharge that committee and take that veto message from the Speaker's table and vote on it.

Would anyone contend that if some Member the first day, before the committee had time to properly consider it, offered such a motion and it were voted down, that thereafter all Members of the House, for all time to come or during the remainder of that Congress, would be precluded from offering another motion to discharge that committee and bring that veto message to the House for a vote? Certainly not.

Further, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] pointed out, wherever a rule provides for only one motion, the rule says so. For instance, back in the old days we could make more than one motion to recommit. There was no limitation. Finally it was limited to two motions to recommit. Now it has been brought down to one.

If it had been the intention of this rule that only one motion to instruct the conferees could be made during the Congress, it would have been written into the rule. So, to hold that the chairman of the committee is precluded from making this motion merely because one motion has been voted on would be to nullify the rule and leave the House in the same helpless position it was before the rule was adopted.

Therefore, I submit the point of order should be overruled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has submitted a motion to instruct the conferees on the so-called "utility bill", which motion has already been read from the Clerk's desk. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] makes the point of order that the motion is not privileged under the rules of the House. The Chair again reads the rule upon which the gentleman from Texas has predicated his motion: Section 1½ (a) of rule XXVIII reads in part as follows:

> After House conferees on any bill or resolution in conference between the House and Senate shall have been appointed for 20 calendar days and shall have failed to make a report, it is hereby declared to be a motion of the highest privilege to move to discharge said House conferees and to appoint new conferees, or to instruct said House conferees.

It will be noted that the rule itself does not undertake to place any limitations upon the number of motions that may be made. The Chair has heretofore stated that, in his opinion, this rule was adopted in the Seventy-second Congress with the sole object and purpose on the part of the House of retaining control over the conferees after they had been appointed to consider differences between the House and the Senate.

Prior to that time, as we all know, after the appointment of the conferees, the House lost control. In fact, if the Chair may repeat, this rule was adopted to bring back to the House control over its own agents, or conferees, after giving them 20 days in which to come to some agreement with the representatives of the other body. To say that control is exhausted after the making of one motion it seems to the Chair is not justified by the rule or by the evident intent of the House when it adopted the rule. Certainly the House did not adopt this rule with the idea of retaining control of its own agents and then immediately after a motion was made, whatever might be the subject of the motion, again surrendering for all time to come control of those agents or those conferees. The Chair thinks, and the Chair may say that the House recognized this fact, as the Chair recognized it when this matter was under consideration on a previous occasion, because it will be remembered that on that occasion the gentleman from Texas first moved to instruct the conferees.

After that motion was acted upon, the gentleman from Alabama himself made a second motion to instruct the conferees, which was also acted upon by the House. If two motions may be made, any number of motions may be made, and it is no answer to the proposition to say that this motion may be made every day or every hour during the day by any Member of Congress who so chooses, because the rule itself does not prohibit the number of motions. The Chair thinks it clear that if the House had intended that only one motion should be made under this rule, it would have said so when the rule was adopted. Certainly the Chair has no authority to limit the number of motions made under the plain reading of this rule.

The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order and the gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, in my time I desire to have read a letter which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 21, 1935.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
Capitol, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAYBURN: I have seen a copy of the proposed substitute for subsection b of section 11 of the public-utility holding-company bill offered by the Senate conferees as a compromise of the differences between the House and Senate bills on the subject matter of such subsection b.

From the point of view of the House, this proposal certainly constitutes a most generous concession on the part of the Senate conferees.

From my point of view, it represents a greater recession from the Senate bill than I should like to see made. But I understand the urgent desire of many members of both Houses to have a bill worked out at this session, and to that end I hope the House will find this proposal of the Senate conferees acceptable.

Very sincerely,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. RAYBURN. I desire to be notified, Mr. Speaker, when I have consumed 12 minutes.

I think I could be more helpful to the House if I proceeded for a little while without interruption. Since this morning I have been working with Mr. Perley, a very capable member of the staff of the legislative counsel, and together we have worked out the salient provisions of Senate section 11 (b), section 11 (b) of the House bill, and the provisions of this proposed matter upon which I have moved to instruct the House conferees.

Under subsection (b) of the Senate section the Securities and Exchange Commission is directed to require, after January 1, 1938, each holding-company system to be reduced to one integrated public-utility system together with such business as is reasonably incidental or economically necessary or appropriate to the operations of such system; and among those businesses which may be considered as reasonably incidental or economically necessary or appropriate specific reference is made to two kinds of business, namely, certain businesses affected with a public interest whose rates are regulated by law, and the business of owning and operating farm lands for agricultural or horticultural purposes in connection with State activities.

The Commission is further directed to require after January 1, 1938, holding companies and their subsidiaries to be reorganized or dissolved when the Commission finds undue or unnecessary complications in the structure of the holding company system or unfair or inequitable distribution of voting power or certain conditions detrimental to the proper functioning of a single integrated public-utility system.

The Commission is also directed to require, after January 1, 1940, each registered holding company to take such steps as the Commission finds necessary or appropriate to make such company cease to be a holding company, with the excepting that first-degree holding companies may be permitted, where the continuance of the holding-company relation is found by the Power Commission to be necessary under State or foreign law for the operations of an integrated public-utility system serving an economic region in a single State or extending into two or more contiguous States or into a foreign country.

Under subsection (b) of the House amendment the Commission is directed to require each holding-company system to reduce its operations to one integrated public-utility system, with the exception, however, that if the Commission finds that it is not necessary in the public interest to limit such operations to one integrated public-utility system, the Commission is to require such action to be taken as is necessary to limit the operations of the system to such number of integrated public-utility systems as it finds may be included in the holding company system consistently with the public interest. Under this House provision, however, the Commission may not require the giving up of interests in nonutility property unless it finds that such interests may not be retained consistently with the public interest, and the Commission may not require the giving up of interests outside of the United States. It is the duty of the Commission, under the House amendment, to require action to be taken by the companies after January 1, 1938.

The compromise provision, with respect to which instruction of the conferees on the part of the House is here proposed, differs from both Senate section 11 and the House section 11. With respect to the question of integrated public-utility systems it provides that the Commission shall, as soon as practicable after January 1, 1938, require each holding-company system to be limited to a single integrated public-utility system and to such other businesses as are reasonably incidental or economically necessary or appropriate to the operation of such integrated system, but includes an exception. It will be recalled that the Senate provision includes no exception from the requirement of one integrated system. The proposed exception, however, does not go quite as far as the House provision. It provides that the Commission shall permit additional integrated systems if it finds that (1) each such additional system cannot be operated as an independent system without the loss of substantial economies which can be secured by the retention of control by the holding company; (2) all such additional systems are located in a restricted area; and (3) the continued combination of such systems is not so large as to impair the advantages of localized management, efficient operation, or the effectiveness of regulation. It is especially provided that the Commission may permit as reasonably incidental or economically necessary or appropriate to the operations of an integrated system the retention of any business, other than a public utility as such, which the Commission finds necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors or consumers and not detrimental to the proper functioning of the system.

The proposed substitute contains a provision which is not in the House amendment but which deals with the same subject as paragraph (2) of subsection (b) of the Senate bill directing the Commission to require each registered holding company and each subsidiary company thereof to take steps necessary to insure that the corporate structure or continued existence of any company in the holding-company system does not unduly or unnecessarily complicate the structure or unfairly or inequitably distribute voting power among security holders of the holding-company system. This differs from the Senate provision in that the Commission is to take such steps as it finds necessary to insure this result, whereas the Senate provision requires reorganization or dissolution.

The provisions of paragraph (3) of subsection (b) of the Senate bill, which requires every holding company to cease to be a holding company, with certain limited exceptions, are not included in this proposed substitute, but there is included a provision requiring the Commission to cause each holding company, and each company in the same holding-company system, to take such action as the Commission finds necessary in order that such holding company shall cease to be a holding company with respect to each of its subsidiary companies which itself has a subsidiary company which is a holding company. The effect of this would be to require holding companies to cease to be holding companies in more than the second degree. This proposed substitute contains another relaxation from the Senate provision in that it provides that the Commission may not require any change in the corporate structure or existence of any company which is not a holding company or of any company whose principal business is that of a public-utility company, except where such action is for the purpose of fairly and equitably distributing voting power among the security holders of such company. [Applause.]

In other words, what we present here today is this: You will hear again today, in all probability, what was so eloquently sung by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] when he last took this floor, and that is on the question of surrender. In my opinion, this proposal in the form of this compromise is a compromise and not a surrender on the part of either the Senate or the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOLAND). The gentleman has consumed 12 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 additional minutes.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am sorry, but I prefer not to yield at this time.

We are up against this proposition: We have come back to the House asking for what I think is a reasonable concession on the part of the House of Representatives. The Senate conferees have already said they do not have to go back to the Senate, because they are unanimously for this proposal. All we have to do to settle this most troublesome part of this most troublesome bill and get a bill back here before the Congress adjourns, that will settle this question, take it out of politics, and out of the campaign next year, is to adopt the simple compromise that I bring to you this afternoon. The question is whether or not we are willing to give, as the Senate conferees and the Senate of the United States are willing to give, in order to get a bill. It is not all that I would want, not all that the Senate would want, not all that any Member of this House would want, but it would be a bill that is effective, that is workable, that is fair, that is just, and will do the job and will clean up the nasty stables that exist from one end of this land to the other, when the great business of utilities, in which many fine men are engaged, will have driven from it the people who have disgraced it and who have brought a stench into the nostrils of so many people. I ask the House today to give us this instruction, that we may have an effective, just, and fair bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I hope the impression has not gone out, by reason of the statement made by the chairman [Mr. RAYBURN] a few moments ago, that the House conferees are submitting this proposal. The House conferees are not submitting this proposal.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will say to the gentleman, if I said that, I certainly did not mean it.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Very well. We never saw this proposal until yesterday morning, when it was presented by the Senate.

This is a very important question, and what we do here today will decide our action on which I believe and what the country believes is the most important piece of legislation that has come before Congress for many years.

In submitting the so-called "Barkley compromise" on the utility bill, the sponsors of the "death sentence" apparently hope to take advantage of the opportunity which the last hurried hours of Congress present.

Certainly, if they knew that there was time for careful consideration of this proposal, they would never have dared to suggest as a compromise something which is merely an elaboration of their original position.

Messrs. Corcoran and Cohen, the authors of the original decree to eliminate holding companies, have rewritten that decree in new language, but the sentence of death remains.

As one member of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, which considered this bill in detail at its hearings for some 2 months, and which then considered it in even greater detail in executive session, and as a member of the conference committee, which has labored on behalf of a compromise with the "death sentence" advocates, I am not surprised that the Senate conferees should, at this last moment, submit a compromise which represents all that they originally asked for.

But do not think anyone will be deceived by this different shroud of language in which death has been newly wrapped.

The Barkley proposal states that "it shall be the duty of the Commission to require, by order, that each holding company and each subsidiary company thereof shall take such action as the Commission shall find necessary or appropriate to limit the operations of the holding-company system, of which such company is a part, to a single integrated public-utility system."

In other words, the utility companies in each system are to be reduced to one single integrated public-utility system, and the exceptions to this, which I shall consider in a moment, will have no particular effect upon this requirement.

The great majority of all utility holding companies which have acquired their properties in different sections of the country on the basis of the oldest investment principle known—diversification of risk—will be required to divest themselves of all but one group of these properties.

It would hardly seem necessary at this time to repeat the effect which this is going to have, not only upon the operations of the light and power service, but upon the investments in public-utility securities.

We stand in exactly the same position, under this proposal, as we stood under the original draft of the Senate bill, which provided destruction.

All of the arguments used against the original Senate bill and supported by the protests of the hundreds of thousands of utility investors, by large and small business organizations, by life-insurance companies, and savings banks, apply as strongly to this provision.

This afternoon I received more than 15 telegrams from the city of Providence, R. I., which is the insurance center of the United States.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER or Ohio. No, not now; not now.

Mr. Speaker, there are three conditions under which the Securities Exchange Commission may permit, at its discretion, a holding company to control more than one public-utility system.

All three conditions must be met if this permission is to be obtained. The first condition exists if "each of such additional systems is incapable of economic operation, independently of such holding company, without the loss of substantial economies not otherwise obtainable."

In other words, the unprofitable companies outside of the integrated systems—those companies which are too weak to stand alone and which contribute nothing to the investor in holding-company securities—may be retained. All the other companies must be surrendered.

The second condition for more than one utility system exists "if all of such additional systems are located in one State or in adjoining States."

That provision is of little importance since, as stated, most of the utility holding companies have acquired their properties in different territories in order to diversify the risk.

In other words, 90 percent of the utility holding companies in our country under that provision would be dissolved.

As a third condition it is stated that the Commission may permit a holding company to continue to have more than one utility system—

> If the combination of such systems under the control of such holding company is not so large as to impair the advantages of localized management, efficient operation, or the effectiveness of regulation.

In other words, the holding company may retain additional systems if the combination is small enough.

I submit to you that the exception granted on the basis of these three conditions does not materially modify the limitation to one integrated public-utility system, nor will it in any way prevent the dismemberment of practically all utility holding companies.

The compromise which we are offered is no more than the provision which the House emphatically rejected in its first vote on the "death sentence" about 2 months ago.

It is the same provision which the Members of the House conference committee, faithfully observing the clear mandate of the House, repeatedly refused to accept in conference. It is the provision which the House itself defeated a second time only 3 weeks ago.

In addition to this "death sentence", the Barkley compromise has added other restrictions, which were originally offered as substitutes for the "death sentence" itself.

Section 2 of the Senate proposal requires that—

> Each registered holding company and each subsidiary thereof shall take such steps as the Commission shall find necessary or appropriate to insure that the corporate structure, or continued existence, of any company in the holding-company system does not unduly or unnecessarily complicate the structure or unfairly or inequitably distribute voting power among security holders.

In order to carry out this provision, the Commission may require—

> Any holding company to cease to be a holding company with respect to each of its subsidiary companies which itself has a subsidiary, which is a holding company.

This complicated provision is merely an additional power conferred upon the Commission to eliminate holding companies and to rearrange their financial structure whenever that structure meets with its disapproval. If the rumored appointment of Mr. Cohen to the Securities Exchange Commission turns out to be true, that section alone would enable the bright young man who drafted the provision to wreak havoc with the utility industry.

As one of the House conferees, I say to you that we have asked the Senate for a compromise and we have been given back the "death sentence."

I believe this House is under a solemn obligation to the people of the country to reject it as we have rejected it before.

I am well aware of the fact that we have been placed under greater pressure to pass this provision than has ever been imposed upon any other Congress.

We have had the Government lobbyists at our elbows.

We have seen an investigation committee attempt to inflame our minds against an entire industry on the basis of the isolated practices of one company which has been used by the advocates of the death sentence as a horrible example of all utility industries.

We are now attempting to reach an adjournment which the Congress, as a whole, desperately needs and desires.

But despite all these influences brought to bear upon us, can we now break faith with the pledge that we have already made—the pledge that whatever bill we pass with regard to the utility industry, or any other industry—must be a bill that regulates and does not destroy. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, when my good friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], stood on the floor to speak in behalf of his previous motion to surrender to the Senate's position on section 11, he buttressed his remarks by having read a newspaper article, which told of a vile personal attack on the President. He was not willing then to base his case upon its merits.

Today he prefaces his remarks by having read a letter from the President of the United States advocating the position which he now takes. He chooses rather to throw the personality of the President into the scale. Again my friend is not willing to base his case on the merits. Again he seeks, by extraneous matter which has no relation to the controversy, to control and to dictate our decision.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] again invites the House to surrender to the Senate. Again, and this for the fourth time, he invites the House to give up its convictions and to submit to the dictation of the Senate.

The House is engaged today in the noble and dignified business of "face saving." Because someone has said that the "death sentence" is proper we are called upon to approve it. Thank God I have no face worth saving and need give that matter no concern. [Laughter.] But some of my colleagues, good Democrats, and honest and patriotic men, do have faces that are as worthy of saving as are the faces of Ben Cohen and Tom Corcoran that the gentleman from Texas is trying so hard to save. [Applause.]

You are again invited to vote the "death sentence." Do not be deceived. Let no Member imagine that he can go home to his constituents and say, "I did not know what I was doing."

We are voting for the "death sentence" in only a slightly different form. A moment ago a friend handed me a clipping from a local newspaper, which has been devoting itself to championing the "death sentence" for the holding companies and to casting aspersions upon any who hold the opposite view. I read from that the following:

> A movement is under way to submit to vote of the House a slightly modified "death sentence." Just enough different from the section previously rejected to permit Members to change their votes gracefully.

[Laughter.]

That is what the champion of the "death sentence" says. There has been sleight-of-hand with words, there has been a jumbling of sentences, there has been a confusion of phrases, but this new version means the same as the original "death sentence", the only purpose of this juggling is to afford any weak-kneed brethren an opportunity to recant. [Laughter and applause.]

This motion is an affront to the dignity and to the self-respect of every Member who voted against Senate section 11. [Applause.] By implication it says to him: "You had no convictions—your vote was not upon principle—you did not know what you were doing; you did not know what you voted for upon the three previous occasions; you did not do what you did for the good of the country or in the interest of justice; it was mere political horseplay and not intended for any serious purpose. You are mere 'rubber stamps' and 'yes men.' Now come back and put yourselves in right by recanting your previous position." For myself, I resent any such implication.

This motion is an affront to the dignity and the independence of the House. Four times has the gentleman from Texas placed the Members of the House in this stultifying position; four times has he asked us to sacrifice our convictions in the interest of saving somebody's face. [Applause.] How does it come about that the faces of the Members of the House are of so little worth that they are to be continually sacrificed to saving the faces of the Members of the Senate?

The Senators have never been given an opportunity to vote upon House section 11. Why are they not permitted to vote on it? It is because those who want the "death sentence" dare not trust the result of a vote in the Senate. They fear they cannot control the Senate; the House is more pliable, more easily swayed by influence, so they evidently believe.

We of the House are repeatedly put on record. We are subjected to the fire of criticism time and again, but the Members of the Senate are to go unscathed—they need not now nor hereafter express their decision as between Senate section 11 and the House section 11.

The Rayburn proposal is merely the "death sentence" in a different form of words. It requires that each company shall be limited to a single utility system, unless the Commission shall permit it to own additional systems under the conditions set out. These conditions are so harsh, rigid, and tortuous that, as a practical matter, compliance with them is impossible. The conditions are as follows:

(A) Each of such additional systems cannot be operated as an independent system without the loss of substantial economies which can be secured by the retention of control by such holding company of such system;

(B) All of such additional systems are located in one State, or in adjoining States, or in a contiguous foreign country; and

(C) The continued combination of such systems under the control of such holding company is not so large (considering the state of the art and the area or region affected) as to impair the advantages of localized management, efficient operation, or the effectiveness of regulation.

To the uninformed, compliance may seem a possibility, but to those with knowledge of the industry they are a mere gesture and semblance, without any real substance. In short, the pretense of permission to hold more than one system adds nothing to the proposal. It would have the same value without such a pretense.

It is important that every citizen should clearly understand the issue on the holding-company bill. The bill has two distinct purposes: First, to regulate the companies; and, second, to limit each of them to a "single geographically and economically integrated system." The latter purpose is embraced in section 11 of the bill. That section is the bone of the controversy. Without that section the bill would have met with practically unanimous approval and would have been passed months ago. Practically every Member favors the regulation of the companies to the most adequate extent.

The proposal to regulate was presented in redemption of the pledge of the Democratic platform of 1932. The idea of destruction was an afterthought. The bill as originally drawn carried no section 11, and hence was wholly a regulatory bill. But those in control were not satisfied merely to redeem the party pledge. They conceived of the holding company as a thing vicious in itself which should be destroyed—that was to be the mission of section 11.

Even without section 11 the bill is the most drastic regulatory measure ever proposed in an American legislative body. It would correct every abuse charged against the holding companies. It covers their relations with their subsidiaries, their accounting practices, the issuance of securities, the acquisition of additional property, and so forth. It would prevent the efforts to influence Congress, now being so wildly exploited against some of the companies.

A holding company is merely a corporation which owns stock in another corporation. These companies prevail in every field of business activity—banking, merchandising, industry, newspaper publishing, transportation, and so forth. Hardly a stock is quoted on the market that is not the stock of a holding company in some degree. Whatever faults may be inherent in utility holding companies attach to all holding companies.

As I have stated, with section 11 cut out of the bill the remainder would serve to regulate the holding companies in a most drastic way. The real fault of the bill in that form would be that it is too drastic and extreme. In conference the differences between House and Senate versions of the regulatory features of the bill were minor, and might easily have been adjusted. The split came over section 11. The House conferees were willing to leave out section 11 entirely and to agree with the Senate on the regulatory sections. That proposal was rejected.

The House conferees also offered to agree to a provision which would have allowed the Commission to permit a holding company to own only such systems, if any, as the Commission might find to be in the public interest—the responsibility would have been placed on the Commission to decide whether the public interest would be served by a holding company owning more than one system, or even a single system. But, no; Senate conferees would not consider this. They insisted upon the "death sentence", and would take nothing less. That was the sole bone of contention, as should be clearly understood. Rather than give up the "death sentence", Senate conferees were willing to throw the whole bill out of the window and leave the holding companies to continue without any regulation whatever.

The proposed section 11, with its "death sentence", to which we are asked to agree, requires the dissolution of all holding companies other than those of the first and second degree, and in practical effect restricts each of them to a single utility system. Under it the dissolution or reorganization of practically all the important companies will be forced. Such effect threatens incalculable losses to all who hold their securities, and to disrupt the entire electrical industry. It will not only hinder recovery but may have effect to throw thousands out of employment. It is highly destructive and deflationary. It will aggravate the depression and unemployment. It is hard to conceive all the harm that its passage may do.

Probably never before has Congress considered a measure under circumstances so unfavorable to just, fair, and deliberate action. Coerced on the one side by official pressure, aided by an unprecedented campaign of publicity and the clamor of agitators and those who sap and mine under our institutions, and on the other by a high-pressure campaign of propaganda—some of it false—instigated by the holding companies, Congress was "the light brigade", propaganda to the right of them, propaganda to the left of them, volleyed and thundered.

In this atmosphere the committee considered the bill, reported upon it, and it was passed through the House. Thereupon, not content with the improper influences which had already been brought to bear, a committee was appointed and proceeded to dig up all of the "dirt" that could be found against the holding companies. Vast publicity was engaged in, reckless accusations were made, and a clamor raised throughout the press—all with the obvious purpose of influencing the conferees in their work. Even the holding of the conference was delayed so as to afford a full opportunity for this improper effort.

Every pressure was brought to bear on House conferees. They were reviled and abused by the ignorant and the dishonest, their views misrepresented, and a general campaign of villification and intimidation carried on.

Of all this, because of my personal views and the position which I occupied in connection with the legislation, I was the chief target. To such lengths did it go that one of my colleagues, sick in bed for weeks, was induced to cause to be placed in the RECORD a vile statement attacking my sincerity—a statement which, as those who instigated it well knew, did not carry a single syllable of truth in its references to me. This statement was printed in the RECORD, and Mr. Corcoran, one of the propagandists for the bill, chortling with glee and proud of his work, brought it to the attention of newspapermen, with the boast that he would have it reproduced in a certain low type of newspaper published in my home city.

The purpose of the statement was to destroy my reputation and my influence with the Members of the House, so as to impair my usefulness as a conferee. I am prevented by the sickness of the Member in whose name the statement was made, and my doubt as to his responsibility, from denouncing the vile defamation as it deserves.

The conferees held their meetings as this discord of propaganda reached its crescendo. It had no bearing on the merits of the measure. I was not moved to the breadth of a hair either way by it. Nevertheless, it is certain that it made the task of the conference much harder.

I have done my duty as I saw it. I have been unawed by power and unafraid amidst clamor. I have now pointed out as I saw them the vices of the proposal which has been made and the evils which will probably flow from it. The responsibility is now cast upon the House of Representatives and upon those who have exerted relentless pressure upon the House for the passage of this extreme and drastic measure.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have said anything about the holding-company bill. It is a subject that so long as it has been discussed in public has been an inflammatory one. I thought when my good friend the gentleman from Alabama appeared on the floor today he was going to announce that the House had won a victory. That is the way I interpret the matter. He certainly was entitled to a victory, because no Napoleon ever led his forces more ably than he has on this great issue.

Since this matter has been discussed yesterday afternoon, it has been presented to some of us as a victory for the House; that the other body was adamant and stubborn and would not yield, and in some instances would not even meet.

Mr. Speaker, we are faced here with a practical situation which we must solve. As I understand it, this bill has been only partly considered thus far, outside of section 11. I understand there are about 18 sections which have not been considered or touched. This proposal has been analyzed and portrayed to me and others, and is, in my opinion, a victory for the House. [Applause.]

May I point out one instance in which it may be so interpreted? You will recall in the discussion of this so-called "death sentence" it was pointed out there was not even a chance for a hearing for the companies affected. All through this proposal, however, there are provisions for "notice" and a chance for a "hearing" before anything can be done which might result in breaking down the system. As I interpret this proposal, it means that Samuel Insull at Chicago may not be able hereafter to run all of the power plants up in Maine, or that Mr. Hopson in New York may not be able to build up an empire throughout the country of over a billion dollars without the original contribution of one penny, an empire composed of 300 companies, owned and controlled absolutely, solely, and individually by Mr. Hopson himself and Mr. Mange. That must not happen again to the detriment of the American people. The testimony before our Rules Committee, investigating lobbying on the utility bill, furnished ample justification that something should be done about this matter. There was a bold admission that from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 had been spent on propaganda against the bill. The shocking admission was also made that the utilities would have spent $6,000,000,000 to stop the bill, not alone the "death sentence" or the Senate bill, but any bill regulating their activities.

The testimony of Mr. Hopson was that he was more opposed to the House bill than he was to the Senate bill. The utilities want no bill whatever. They do not want any Federal regulation. They are content with the minor regulation in the States of the Union.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this proposal is a distinct victory over the "death sentence", as it was contained in the Senate bill. This proposal does permit holding companies which are really integrated units and are natural units, to operate in a real concentrated territory without spreading their talons all over the country, with an Insull in Chicago picking up a little power plant in Florida or a Hopson from 61 Broadway, New York City, operating a little plant in Oklahoma at the expense of the consumers and the investors.

You will notice in this proposal also that the action of the Commission must take into account the interest of the investors, those people who were supposed to have written to us, begging our support. Of course, we are interested in them. Their interests are supposed to be protected under this proposal, and I believe the situation as it will work out under this proposal is better than the Senate bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we will be back here in January. This matter is not going to be worked out in 1 month, or 3 months, or 6 months, or a year. Business requires, the interests of employers require, and the interests of the employees and that of the investors and the consumers require that this question be settled at this time in some way, so we can go ahead with our business, and if we are not right, when we come back here next session we can take care of it. The interests of the House, the interests of the administration, the interests of our constituents that we get out a bill, and this is the only way we can get a bill. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, this debate seems to have resolved itself into an argument as to whether the compromise offered by the Senate conferees as a substitute for section 11 of the Wheeler-Rayburn utility holding company bill is a legitimate compromise or a camouflage. In my opinion, it is not only a legitimate compromise but an outright concession on the part of the Senate conferees upon every material point for which the majority of the membership of the House has been contending. I agree with the statement just made by the distinguished Chairman of the Rules Committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], that this compromise proposal is a victory for the House, because, in my opinion, it effectively eliminates the so-called "death sentence", and the death sentence was the only part of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill to which the majority of the Members of the House objected when the bill was originally before this body. There is no reason, therefore, so far as I can see, why anyone who supported the House bill cannot or should not support this compromise and thereby make possible the enactment before adjournment of this very necessary and important legislation, which otherwise will have to go over until the next session of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, in considering the proposal before us I think it would be profitable to pause for a moment and briefly review the events which have led up to this offer on the part of the Senate conferees, an offer which I contend removes from section 11 the unconditional "death clause" and makes of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill a constructive and necessary regulatory measure, instead of the destructive and unnecessary piece of legislation which the administration originally planned and out of which the administration for the past 2 months has been endeavoring to make a political, partisan issue.

So much propaganda has been put out in connection with this bill, both by the administration and by the utility companies, ever since it has been before the House that I venture to say not 1 person in 100 in the United States has the remotest idea what the Wheeler-Rayburn bill is really about. They are particularly uninformed, as well as misinformed, as to what the so-called "death sentence" provision of the Senate version of this bill is, notwithstanding the tremendous amount of publicity which has been given to this controversial feature. And not only this but the administration, on the one hand, and the utilities, on the other hand, have so distorted and confused the issue that even many of the Members of Congress freely admit that they are not at all certain just what is the issue involved in the motion now before us. And in this connection I want to say here and now that the methods of propaganda and of lobbying employed both by the administration and by the utilities upon this bill have, in my humble opinion, been equally reprehensible and that they deserve the general condemnation of the country.

Now what is the issue involved in the motion before us to instruct the House conferees to accept the compromise offered by the Senate conferees on section 11 of the Senate bill which, in its original form, contained the so-called "death" clause? Does the compromise offered effectively eliminate the "death sentence"? If it does, then all of us who voted to substitute the House bill with its own section 11 for section 11 of the Senate bill, and who also voted for the House bill after it was substituted for the Senate bill, should vote for this compromise, which is offered as an adjustment of the difference between section 11 of the House bill and section 11 of the Senate bill. If, on the other hand, the compromise offered does not effectively eliminate the "death sentence" to which the majority of us objected when the bill was before us last month for consideration, then, to be consistent, we should vote down this compromise and insist upon the House bill as passed on July 2, even though such action on our part would mean no utility bill at all at the present session of Congress.

Gentlemen will understand, of course, that I am addressing myself now only to those who, like the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] and myself, voted for the House bill after the "death sentence" was stricken out. My argument on this point does not apply to those who voted against the House bill after it was substituted for the Senate bill. As to those Members, numbering only 81 out of the total of 404 voting, no compromise is consistently possible, because those 81 Members plainly declared by their votes on July 2 that they were opposed to the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, even with the so-called "death sentence" eliminated. On the other hand, the 323 Members of the House, including myself, who voted for the bill upon final passage, just as emphatically declared by our votes that we favored the Wheeler-Rayburn bill and were opposed only to including in it the "death sentence" provision. For us, therefore, the question is now, Does the proposed compromise, which is the subject of this motion, effectively eliminate the "death sentence"?

In considering this question it should be remembered that so far as the 323 Members who voted for the House bill are concerned, there was and still is only one real controversial feature in the entire Wheeler-Rayburn bill, consisting of some 150 printed pages, and that was and still is subdivision B (3) of section 11 of the Senate version which contained the "death clause." Aside from that particular subdivision, the House and Senate versions of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill are virtually identical in all material respects. Each bill provides for the complete regulation and control of public-utility holding companies by the Federal Government. Under either bill a public-utility holding company is virtually operated under orders from the Federal Securities Exchange Commission. Under either bill no utility holding company security may be sold, no purchase or sale by a holding company of an operating utility may be made, and no official act of any kind affecting the legal rights of their consumers or security holders may be done by public-utility holding companies except by permission of the Federal Securities Exchange Commission. The provisions for all of this regulation and control are the same in both the House and Senate bills, and to all of this regulation and control the House by the overwhelming majority of 323 to 81 expressed its entire approval upon final passage of the bill on July 2.

Furthermore, it will be recalled that both the House and Senate bills have identical provisions for the simplification of holding-company systems, for the divestment in proper cases of holding companies, under reviewable orders, of their interest and control in certain operating utilities, for the elimination of stock watering and racketeering, for the limitation of the operation of holding companies in certain cases to one or more integrated systems, for the dissolution in other cases of unnecessary holding companies, for the issuance, sale, and regulation of securities of holding companies, and for the protection of their consumers and investors. The House on July 2 likewise expressed its approval of all of these simplification and reform provisions of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill by the almost unprecedented vote of nearly 4 to 1.

Again, with the single exception of subdivision B (3), which contained the unconditional, nonreviewable, and unappealable "death sentence", the remaining portions even of section 11 of the House and Senate bills are identical. Sections 11 of both bills, for example, provide that utility holding companies may be required to take whatever action the Commission may find necessary to divest themselves of such interest in operating companies as the Commission may determine upon hearing to be in the public interest, all of the orders of the Commission in this regard being subject, of course, to review and order by the court before they become effective. All of this is, of course, drastic, regulatory legislation, but in the opinion of 323 of us, out of the total of 404 who voted upon final passage of the House bill, it was not too drastic to meet a critical public-utility holding company problem which it had become the duty of this Congress to solve.

One of the principal reasons why all of these provisions of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill met the almost unanimous approval of the House was the fact that the bill provided—after Senate provision B (3) was eliminated—that every order of the Commission was automatically subject to judicial review and that no order could become effective until the court passed upon it. In that way every right of the $5,000,000 holding company security holders in the United States was legally and adequately protected. It is a rather remarkable fact, I think, that in a bill so important and far-reaching as this one such unanimity of opinion could be reached in a body of this size. Only 81 Members of the House, Democrats and Republicans, by their votes objected to any of the provisions of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill which I have just recited.

Now, remembering that this was the case, and keeping in mind the fact that aside from subdivision B (3) of section 11 there was no essential difference between the House and Senate versions of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, let us inquire what the issue was which arose upon the motion to substitute the House bill for the Senate bill on July 2. The sole issue upon the motion to substitute the House for the Senate bill on July 2 arose over the proposed inclusion of subdivision B (3) of section 11 of the Senate bill, which provided that immediately after January 1, 1940, every public-utility holding company, except those which the Commission might choose to exempt, should cease to be a holding company, and that the Commission should either dissolve those companies or otherwise divest them of their property by an order which under the language of this subdivision the court was compelled to enforce by the immediate seizure of all the property of the company and the appointment of a receiver for its operation or liquidation.

The language of this subdivision, which has come to be known as the "death sentence", deprived the holder of stock or other securities of the company, who may have been injured by such an order, from the right to have the order of the Commission reviewed by a court of competent jurisdiction, and thus superseded and extinguished the general right of review provided in section 24 of both bills. The House version did not contain this unconditional and nonreviewable "death" clause to be imposed in 1940 and that was and still is the sole essential difference between the two bills.

On the vote to exclude this "death sentence" as a part of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill the House stood 258 for exclusion to 147 against. During the 3 weeks following this vote the administration, which was reported to have declared that it would rather have no bill at all than to accept the Wheeler-Rayburn bill without the "death sentence", employed every pressure at its command to induce Democratic Members to change their votes in this regard. The titular author of the bill in the Senate, Mr. WHEELER, openly announced that he intended to make a political issue of the "death sentence" in the 1936 campaign and the President, without any denial from him, allowed it to be repeatedly stated that he intended to make the "death sentence" a political issue. Democratic Members were threatened with opposition in their primary campaigns unless they should agree to support subdivision B (3) of section 11 of the Senate bill. The utility lobby investigation was continued and publicized throughout the country largely for the purpose of bringing pressure to bear upon Democratic Members.

With the stage thus set after a month of preparatory propaganda and under the lash of the administration whip, the administration on August 1 caused to be reported to this House a resolution to instruct the House conferees to accept the unconditional, nonreviewable, and unappealable "death sentence" contained in subdivision (B) (3) of the Senate bill. But, in spite of all its propaganda and all its threatening, the administration failed, as it failed upon the original vote on July 2, and the House on August 1 again rejected subdivision (B) (3) of the Senate bill by practically the same majority as on July 2.

Gentlemen have stated here on the floor today that the compromise now brought in by the Senate conferees is no compromise at all—that the compromise is in effect the same unconditional "death sentence" which we have twice rejected. But I call attention to the fact that those who have made this assertion here include only those gentlemen who voted against the House bill after the "death sentence" was eliminated. No one who voted for the House bill after it was substituted for the Senate bill has made any such contention, and I predict now that not more than a score of the Members who voted for the House bill after the "death clause" was eliminated will now vote against the compromise on section 11 offered by the Senate conferees.

The reason for this, if we will pause long enough to lay aside the passion and prejudice that has been engendered by this controversy, will be plainly seen by anyone who carefully reads the language of the compromise proposal, and that reason simply is that the proffered compromise effectively eliminates the "death sentence." In other words, the House, both Democratic and Republican, by its insistence that section B (3) be excluded as a part of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, has called the bluff and the threat of the administration that it would rather have no bill at all unless it can have it with the "death sentence", and the administration in this compromise offer has, in my opinion, gone the whole way and has stricken out the "death sentence."

The language of this compromise on section 11 contains, of course, some face-saving words. This is natural. I have no doubt also that after this bill is passed the administration, for political purposes, will contend that there is really no great difference between section 11 as originally drawn and section 11 as it appears in this compromise proposal. For that reason I desire to call the attention of the House and of the country now to the fact that no administration leader on the floor of the House has made any such contention in this debate. They all have contended that the exact opposite is true, and in this I concur. If it were not so, the compromise would have no chance whatever of adoption by the House. The fact is that cold analysis will show that there is practically no similarity between section 11 of the Senate bill and the substitute section contained in the compromise, and that, as a matter of fact, the compromise section upon which we are now about to vote is even more liberal than section 11 of the House bill which was adopted in this body on July 2 and by a majority of nearly 4 to 1.

Briefly now, what are the provisions which the compromise motion proposes to substitute for sections 11 of the House and Senate bills? The compromise provides that instead of the unconditional and nonreviewable "death" mandate of Senate provision B (3), which applies to all holding companies without exception, the Commission (1) shall require by order after notice and hearing that each registered holding company shall take such steps as the Commission shall find necessary to insure that the corporate structure or continued existence of the holding company system does not unduly or unnecessarily complicate the structure or unfairly or inequitably distribute voting power among security holders, and that (2) in carrying out this provision registered holding companies shall be required to take such steps as may be necessary to eliminate their holding-company status with respect to those of their subsidiary holding companies which in turn have subsidiaries which are themselves holding companies.

This seemingly complicated language simply means, upon analysis, that orders of the Commission having to do with the elimination of a holding-company relationship must be confined to holding companies of the third degree or higher; that is to say, to holding companies whose corporate structure is at least three times removed from direct control or ownership of an operating company.

Further, under the compromise proposal every order of the Commission in this limited field—which, by the way, is the field in which nearly all of the utility-securities racketeering has taken place—is subject to judicial review, and no order can be effective unless and until the Court has approved it by its own order.

That this proposal is clearly within the constitutional requirement of due process has not been denied in the course of this debate nor elsewhere. That it will result in an admittedly necessary reform in the present irresponsible system of pyramiding utility holding company structures, some of which extend as far as the tenth degree in point of remoteness from the operating utility at the bottom of the structure, has not been questioned. That under this proposal every security owner of a utility holding company will be legally and adequately protected has not been challenged by any opponent of the compromise section 11, which we are now considering. I repeat, therefore, that this compromise, if adopted, will remove the very objections which were made to section 11 of the Senate bill by those of us who voted to substitute the House bill and who by our votes passed the House bill on July 2.

What was it we objected to in connection with section 11 of the Senate bill, and particularly in connection with subdivision B (3) of that section? We objected to the Senate provision B (3) because it was unconstitutional. The provisions of the compromise substitute for B (3) are constitutional, in my opinion, beyond question. We objected to the provisions of Senate B (3) because orders of the Commission under it were not subject to judicial review.

The compromise substitute makes judicial review mandatory and does not permit any order to become effective unless the court approves it. We objected to Senate provision B (3), because it arbitrarily put out of business every holding company, without respect to the degree of its remoteness from the operating company, without regard as to whether it was lawful or unlawful, and regardless of whether it was good or bad or whether it was a necessary or an unnecessary holding company. The compromise substitute provision requires the elimination only of such remote control in the holding company relationship as is obviously harmful to operating companies, to the investors in operating companies and to the investors in holding companies. We objected to Senate provision B (3), because it did not give to a security holder his day in court. The compromise substitute makes the day in court a condition precedent to the effectiveness of any order of the Commission in which the property rights or the security of a stockholder in either a holding company or an operating company is concerned.

In my opinion, and I have made a long and careful and a thoughtful study of this whole legislation, there is as much difference between this compromise proposal and the unconditional death clause of Senate provision B 3 as there is between day and night and, in spite of an apparent similarity in some of the language used, they are as far removed from one another as the poles. As a vigorous and consistent opponent of the death sentence, who is ready again to oppose it with his voice and his vote every time it may be offered, I am entirely willing to accept this compromise proposal, because, by it the death sentence is removed.

I am glad that this session within the next few days can adjourn with the feeling of having done its duty in regard to utility legislation. I am glad the administration has at last come to its senses and has stopped playing politics with this vital and important subject. I am glad it has finally come in with a proposal which can be accepted by those of us who favor effective and drastic regulation but who do not favor ruthless destruction. The adoption of the compromise motion, in my humble opinion, settles every legitimate question that can now be raised in connection with the Wheeler-Rayburn bill. It allows us to have a real regulatory bill, one that is constitutional, one which, I believe, is fair; and all those who insisted upon the House bill and voted against the death sentence can and should support the motion to adopt this resolution, which I sincerely believe is an outstanding victory for the House. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, this agreement is not exactly what I should like to see. The truth of the business is that neither the House bill nor the Senate bill went as far as I should like to go, but this compromise is more in favor of the House bill than it is the Senate bill.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] did not want the "death sentence." He told us, "You are preparing now to lynch the holding companies." Now he does not even want them to go to trial.

My objection to this bill is that it does exactly what the enemies of it said before they wanted it to do; that is, they wanted them to have a trial before we went ahead and executed some of them for the perfidy they have already perpetrated.

The gentleman from Alabama talks about the people back home. You are already hearing from the people back home, and however frightful to some Members Hopson may be in the galleries, however frightful all this spurious Power Trust propaganda may be to some Members, when they get home they are going to find themselves in the position of the two fellows on the plains when a buffalo got after them. One of them hastily climbed up a small tree that just held him above the buffalo's head, while the other ran into a sink hole, and when the buffalo would run for him he would draw his head down and come up again as soon as the buffalo had passed. His friend in the tree said, "Why do you not stay down there?" He said, "Stay down there nothing, there is a bear in this hole as big as three buffaloes." [Laughter.]

You wait until you get home and find the indignation that all this saturnalia of propaganda and all these revelations have stirred up, and you will find that the people of the United States are with us on this proposition and are more dangerous than all the Power Trust propagandists in Washington, Hopson included.

Now, personally, I do not care whether you adopt this motion or not. I am going to vote for it, because it is our only chance to get a bill; but so far as I am individually concerned, I have no fear of going to the American people on this proposition and I have no fear of what the verdict will be. The American people are tired of being overcharged $1,000,000,000 a year for electric light and power. They are tired of seeing people robbed and plundered through the sale of watered stock. They are tired of the saturnalia of graft and fraud and corruption that has characterized these holding companies for the last few years, and are going to put a stop to it. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I trust we are not going to permit ourselves to be carried away by the eloquence or logic of our distinguished friend from Alabama, for whom I have the very greatest admiration and personal esteem.

This matter resolves itself in my mind to this simple proposition: There has not been a Member upon this floor in opposition to this bill from the time it was first taken up—there has not been, so far as I know, among the newspapers which have opposed legislation along this line—there has been no one who has not said that there ought to be some legislation provided for the control of holding companies. There has not been any man on this floor who has declared otherwise.

On the contrary, every one of them has made the admission, in argument against this bill, that something of that kind was needed.

If that be true, we cannot adjourn this Congress and go back to our constituents and admit our inability to pass some kind of legislation looking to control of holding companies.

It is a plain, simple proposition. The gentleman from Alabama has said, leaving out the section to which he takes exception, that this is a stronger control or regulatory measure than the bill that passed the Senate.

If I understand him correctly, if that section was taken out of this bill he would be willing to vote for it.

What are you and I going to do? We have been here 8 months. Are we going home and say to our people that we cannot pass a bill looking to the control and regulation of holding companies which everyone admits is needed?

Now, I cannot discuss the merits of the bill. I have not the time and cannot enter into a discussion of its details.

I am appealing to you gentlemen, and particularly gentlemen on this side who are responsible to the people for legislation passed in this House, to adopt this motion of the gentlemen from Texas and settle this issue. [Applause.]

I concur with the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] that it is a victory for the House, and I want to congratulate the gentleman from Texas on his proposal of this motion and express the hope that this compromise will be accepted and that we shall finally settle this issue. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have here a newspaper article from this morning's Washington Herald, which says, in part:

> GARNER protested against making the question of utility regulation a campaign issue. He declared it would destroy one of the two major parties. BYRNS and O'CONNOR were heard to counter with declarations that the President's program would destroy the rights of tens of thousands of investors.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] read that thing to me this morning. I think it is going a long way to quote as coming from two men in the high stations of the Vice President of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives something that does not put one word in quotation marks, and I venture to say that neither the Speaker of this House nor the Vice President of the United States said anything within a hundred miles of that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote; and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 219, nays 142, not voting 69, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

DEFINITIONS

SECTION 1. That as used in this act—

(a) The term "carrier" includes any express company, sleeping-car company, freight-forwarding company, private car line, or carrier by railroad, subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and any company which may be directly or indirectly owned or controlled by or under common control with any such carrier by railroad and which operates any equipment or facilities or performs any service (other than trucking service), in connection with the transportation of passengers or property by railroad, or the receipt, delivery, elevation, transfer in transit, refrigeration or icing, storage, or handling of property transported by railroad, and any receiver, trustee, or other individual or body, judicial or otherwise, when in the possession of and operating the business of any such "carrier."

(b) The term "employee" means (1) each person who at or after the enactment hereof is in the service of a carrier, and (2) each officer or other official representative of an "employee organization", herein called "representative", who before or after the effective date has performed service for a carrier, who is duly designated and authorized to represent employees under and in accordance with the Railway Labor Act, and who, during or immediately following employment by a carrier, was or is engaged in such representative service in behalf of such employees.

(c) A person shall be deemed to be in the service of a carrier whenever he may be subject to its continuing authority to supervise and direct the manner of rendition of his service, for which service he receives compensation.

(d) The term "compensation" means any form of money remuneration for active service, received by an employee from a carrier, including salaries and commissions, but shall not include free transportation nor any payment received on account of sickness, disability, or other form of personal relief.

If the taxes are not paid when due, there shall be added as part of the tax (except in the case of adjustments made in accord with the provisions of this act) interest at the rate of 1 percent per month, or for any part of a month, from the date the tax became due until paid.

(b) Such taxes shall be collected and paid quarterly in such manner and under such conditions not inconsistent with this act as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the first payment to become due on the 1st day of October 1935.

GUFFEY-SNYDER COAL BILL

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9100) to stabilize the bituminous coal-mining industry and promote its interstate commerce; to provide for cooperative marketing of bituminous coal; to levy a tax on bituminous coal and provide for a drawback under certain conditions; to declare the production, distribution, and use of bituminous coal to be affected with a national public interest; to conserve the bituminous coal resources of the United States; to provide for the general welfare, and for other purposes; and providing penalties, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees:

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL, Mr. LEWIS of Maryland, Mr. VINSON of Kentucky, Mr. KNUTSON, and Mr. REED of New York.

NEUTRALITY BILL

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have until 12 o'clock midnight tonight to submit the neutrality bill and file a report thereon.

There was no objection.

REPORT FROM COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until 12 o'clock tonight to file a report from the Committee on Military Affairs relating to its investigation under House Resolution 59.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

PUBLIC WORKS ON RIVERS AND HARBORS FOR FLOOD CONTROL, ETC.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H. R. 8455, authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were ayes 171 and noes 66.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H. R. 8455, with Mr. FULLER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is an emergency measure. It is an important measure. We have had appeals from throughout the Nation for comprehensive plans for flood control, for the protection of life and property throughout the Nation.

The estimate and survey show that there are losses of more than $300,000,000 every year on streams and watersheds throughout the United States. Some steps should be taken by Congress to prevent this loss. We have had appeals that Congress should take some action for a comprehensive plan for flood control under some agency that is qualified to handle it, and undertake emergency projects wherever plans are ready under that agency, in order to begin a comprehensive plan for flood control. On account of these appeals the Committee on Flood Control early in this Congress commenced hearings in order to collect data to show where we might go in a public-works program, in an emergency program, to make investments that would show returns, for the protection of life and property throughout the United States.

The hearings disclosed that within the next 2 years, in emergency projects, we could spend $604,000,000. We secured from the Army Engineers, after their surveys, the most meritorious projects where work could begin under that organization at once, if given approval by this Congress. It is necessary, in order to carry on flood control and river and harbor works under the $4,800,000,000 appropriation, that they have the approval of Congress. Therefore we have brought before the Congress the recommendations of the engineers of meritorious projects, where an emergency exists, for the protection of life and property, where work should begin in a coordinated way with the final completion of that project upon those streams.

This bill authorizes $370,000,000 for those projects. Of course, there will be others to be undertaken, but it is left in the discretion of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers. Not $1 will be wasted. Eighty percent goes to employment and 15 percent goes to the purchase of materials, which give employment to labor.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Is it contemplated to offer committee amendments to add $70,000,000 more to this bill?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No. There are no committee amendments. Some meritorious amendments may be offered. It is entirely up to the committee whether or not they approve it. But we had these hearings and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], regardless of the criticism he has made of this bill, came to show meritorious projects where life and property and business interests were in danger, and appealed to the committee to recommend those.

The recommendation showed those who were meritorious. What I cannot understand, then, is this criticism of the bill by one who wants help.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman will look at the hearings he will not find anything resembling the statement he has just made as coming from me.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The gentleman asked for these projects for his district, and they are meritorious; and not one project that is not of merit will be undertaken, because it is under the direction of the Secretary of War. These engineers do not have to go out and set up a new organization. These projects are permanent investments, investments of merit to protect life and property throughout the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Does the gentleman expect to ask any appropriation at this session of Congress or will he depend entirely on the $4,800,000,000 fund in the hands of the President?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. We shall depend for the present on the $4,800,000,000 fund, but the bill contains authorization for the continuation of meritorious projects in Tennessee, Kentucky, and elsewhere; it contains authorization to go to the Appropriations Committee for money to complete the projects.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. But for the present the gentleman expects to depend on the $4,800,000,000 fund.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. For the initial allotments, but we want to be on a firm basis on these projects, for they will be worth a great deal to the Nation in the saving of lives and property every year.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. BOLTON. I understood the gentleman to say that these proposals all had met with the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The recommendation and the statement of the engineers are in this report on every project.

Mr. BOLTON. They all come from Report No. 308, did they not?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That states exactly what they are.

Mr. BOLTON. The report states they met with the approval of the Corps of Engineers, but I understood the gentleman to say that they met with the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I say that every project is here on its merit and there is a statement which shows those projects which are most meritorious, those which will be the best investment and those which can be built with the greatest economy. That is what they said before our committee.

Mr. BOLTON. From the general survey under Report No. 308.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. BOLTON. The engineers made the recommendation in the first instance.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. They are mentioned under Report No. 308 and in section 10 of the Flood Control Act.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. What disturbs me about this bill is whether or not the large sum which is required to meet the exactions of this bill is to be superimposed on the $4,800,000,000, or is it the gentleman's expectation that all of this money required to meet these flood-control projects will be taken out of the $4,800,000,000? I want a direct answer to that.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. We will get an allotment from the President from the $4,800,000,000 for the work that is to be undertaken, but it will be necessary to carry these projects on to final completion and to coordinate them. After the public-works allotment has expired, we expect them to go to the Appropriations Committee from year to year for funds to carry on the completion of these meritorious projects throughout the Nation.

Mr. LUDLOW. Just one more short question, if the gentleman will yield. Would the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment providing that the funds required to pay for these projects shall be taken out of the $4,800,000,000?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No; I would not; because some of the projects recommended—very meritorious ones—will take 4 or 5 years to complete and coordinate, if we take the plans of the engineers, and the $4,800,000,000 might be exhausted before that time. We propose to go ahead and complete this work for the protection of the life and property of the people of this Nation.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Is it not also true that if this work is done at the present time, it will give employment and take men from the relief rolls?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It will be carried on by the Corps of Army Engineers, just as all such projects are carried on.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman does not contend that this is a relief project at all, does he?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The main thing I have in mind is protection of the life and property of the citizens of the United States. During the present year over $300,000,000 of property has been destroyed by flood, and in the section along the St. Francis River more than 2,000 people were driven from their homes.

In the State of New York just a few days ago we were eyewitnesses to the tremendous destruction of life, property, and homes. Congress can make no better permanent investment than this investment which will protect the lives and property of its citizens.

Mr. MICHENER. To carry out the policy of the gentleman it would seem to me he was going to canalize practically every stream throughout the United States.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. That is what ought to be done.

Mr. MICHENER. That is nice talk, but the gentleman and I know it is not going to take place.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It can be done.

Mr. MICHENER. It can be, but we do not expect to do it.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. If it is of economic value and life and property is in danger and the work can be done to avert their disaster, it should come about.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee for a few minutes to a matter that I think is of underlying importance in connection with the enactment of this bill. Permit me to direct attention to the first sentence of the bill reading as follows:

> That the following works of improvement of rivers, harbors, and other waterways for flood-control purposes are hereby adopted and authorized, to be prosecuted unless herein otherwise provided under the direction of the Secretary of War and supervision of the Chief of Engineers, in accordance with the plans, in the respective reports and records hereinafter designated.

Then follows a list of projects throughout the United States that have been surveyed and approved by the Corps of Engineers of the Army.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman mean to tell us that the projects listed in this bill have been approved by the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. MILLER. The projects listed in the bill have been surveyed by the Corps of Engineers; yes.

Mr. TABER. But the gentleman does not mean to say that they have been approved by the Corps of Engineers?

Mr. MILLER. I mean to say they have approved the projects on that stream, but I do not mean to say these projects have been recommended by the Chief of Engineers. There is no dispute about the meaning of the bill at all. The underlying principle of this bill is one that the Congress must face and the sooner we face it the better. The control of floods in this country on any stream that may be mentioned is a national question. It is not a local question any more and just as soon as the Congress stops appropriating money for flood control and spending it haphazardly and adopts a comprehensive and coordinated flood-control program in this country, just that soon and no sooner will we solve this problem.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. In order to understand the situation, the gentleman states that all projects in this bill have been surveyed by the engineers; but he does not say they have been recommended by them. So far as the House knows the engineers may have recommended against them after the survey.

Mr. MILLER. I would not say that is correct.

Mr. MAPES. I say as far as the House knows, they may have recommended against them.

Mr. MILLER. I can speak about the individual projects I know about. I know they have been approved, referring to the ones I am personally and deeply interested in. May I say to the gentleman that if a project is not approved by the Chief of Engineers as feasible and economically justified no man is ever going to get money with which to erect and build it. As a practical proposition the allocation will be made on that basis.

Mr. MAPES. But the Bureau of Reclamation and those in charge of P. W. A. funds have gone ahead with projects that the Chief of Engineers has not approved?

Mr. MILLER. Do not take up my time on that unless I yield. I do not know about that.

Mr. MAPES. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought he yielded to me.

Mr. MILLER. The question I am concerned with and the question that the House and this Congress is concerned with lies in the adoption of a comprehensive program. The passage of this bill does not mean that all of these projects are going to be built or erected. It simply places them in line for consideration by the National Emergency Council upon their merits for the allocation of funds from the works-relief money that has already been appropriated.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WOOD. Does the gentleman think there could be any comprehensive system worked out in the White River Valley in Arkansas unless the Table Rock proposition was included in that.

Mr. MILLER. I do not.

A study of this bill will reflect the fact that every project on the streams enumerated herein represents a component part in a coordinated plan for the control of floods on that particular stream and the stream into which it runs. That is the important feature of this bill. That is a question of policy which confronts this Congress in the adoption and passage of this bill, and the beginning of the spending of money on coordinated systems and coordinated units or on work that will in the future constitute and does now constitute a part of a coordinated system. When we adopt such a program we will be taking a long step in the right direction.

No better way can be found for the expenditure of public funds than their investment in permanent and coordinated flood-control works and structures, and if the National Emergency Council and other agencies for the allocation of funds from the public-works appropriation will allocate a major portion of such funds for the building of these permanent structures which may control the flood waters of our streams and at the same time be used in the creation of electrical power a real contribution to the welfare of our country will be made and its resources conserved and augmented.

I appeal to you for the favorable consideration of this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman from Arkansas in his earlier statement accused us on this side of filibustering. It has become a habit lately of the Members of the majority that every time the Members of the minority dare voice opposition to some of this quack legislation that is being put through the House at the present time we are charged with filibustering. May I say to you gentlemen that inside of a year you will wish some of us had filibustered a little longer and you did not pass quite so much of the kind of legislation that is being passed here today and which it is intended to pass.

Several gentlemen have used the argument that this four or five billion dollars is going to be wasted and you might just as well spend it on works down on the various tributaries of the Mississippi River and in other parts of the United States. You do not want to fool yourselves in regard to this bill. It simply authorizes these projects. There is not a particle of certainty that any one of them will be built or any money spent from the public-works fund.

Mr. DISNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. DISNEY. Then what harm can be done if this bill merely authorizes?

Mr. SNELL. I have had some experience in this House. When a man has a poor proposition he always says that there is no harm done because we just authorize the expenditure and we have to come back to the Appropriations Committee to get the appropriation anyway. But when you go back to that committee I know precisely the argument that is used; that is, the House itself has authorized this project and now it is up to the Appropriations Committee to appropriate for it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. How long will this organization continue?

Mr. SNELL. As long as there is any money in the Treasury, and in fact for all time, unless repealed.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. That is what I thought.

Mr. SNELL. That may not be very long.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does the gentleman think that the authorization will cease when the United States is hopelessly bankrupt and there is no more money in the Treasury?

Mr. SNELL. No; it will always be there.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. It has been suggested that some of these projects have not been recommended by the Army Engineers. Do I understand that if this bill is passed with this authorization, hereafter the Appropriations Committee would be forced to appropriate for these projects even though they might not be approved?

Mr. SNELL. I would not say they would be forced to do it, but my experience in this House has been that where an authorization has been made the people who are interested go before the Appropriations Committee and say, "the House itself has authorized this and we expect you to appropriate for it", and, eventually, they get the appropriation.

Mr. HALLECK. If the gentleman will permit one further question, would that situation prevail in view of the fact that a number of the members of the Committee, as well as the people interested in this bill, have assured us that they are seeking the money alone from the $4,800,000,000 that has heretofore been appropriated.

Mr. SNELL. I will tell the gentleman how we can try that out. We are going to offer an amendment that this money be paid out of the $4,800,000,000 and the gentleman will see how many of them vote for the amendment and we can then test their sincerity in regard to the proposition.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. In the amendment which the gentleman is going to suggest will he also place in his amendment a provision that these funds be appropriated for work to be completed under the allocation, so that it will not be possible to start the canalization of a stream, for instance, and get the foundation laid, which is simply the nose of the camel getting under the tent and then require that many times the amount of the original appropriation be appropriated to finish the work?

Mr. SNELL. That is always the way it is done.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Do I understand an amendment is to be offered taking this money out of the P. W. A. fund?

Mr. SNELL. I think one will be offered.

Mr. McCORMACK. Without indicating how I shall vote on the amendment I hope whoever drafts the amendment will keep in mind that each State is supposed to have its proportionate share.

Mr. SNELL. Well, there will be some excuse so that most of the Members on that side of the aisle will not vote for it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Now, in regard to this report, it is very cleverly drawn. It states, "The projects selected in this measure have been approved by the Corps of Army Engineers." This would lead the average Member of the House to believe that the Board of Army Engineers had approved these projects. After reading the report yesterday I took the pains to call up the Chief of Engineers and, as a matter of fact, the Chief of Engineers has not approved a single one of the projects in this bill.

Mr. KELLER. Do they ever do it?

Mr. SNELL. I did not yield to the gentleman.

They have not approved any of these projects and they have not recommended them. The only thing the Army Engineers have done in regard to these projects is that several years ago we passed a general bill asking them to make a survey. They have made the survey but they have made no recommendations of approval or disapproval, notwithstanding the statement made in the report.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. BOLTON. The survey to which the gentleman has referred is contained in what is known as "Report No. 308" from the Corps of Engineers, which covers not only a survey for flood control but power and navigation as well, and simply gives the possibilities of development without any recommendation.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman for a brief question.

Mr. FERGUSON. I hold in my hand a project for the development of rivers and harbors, put out by the Army Engineers, and on each of these projects they have figured whether the returns would be economically sound. So while this is not a recommendation, they have passed on each project as to its economic feasibility.

Mr. SNELL. When we originally passed the flood-control bill, we made provision in that bill that the local communities should pay for the land on which the levees were placed and for the flowage rights. The other day when we passed another law amending that bill and relieving these communities from this obligation, I made a fight against it, and your own President has today sent down a veto message based practically on the argument that I made at that time.

In this bill you do not go so far as to say that the State shall pay for the land where these improvements are made——

Mr. FERGUSON rose.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman need not get up so quickly, I know what he is going to say, and I have read the full report. But the joker here is, the Secretary of War can make an exception, and if you have a friendly Secretary of War, he can make exceptions so that the local communities will not have to pay a single, solitary nickel, and if he wants to he can add $130,000,000 to this bill by relieving these communities from this obligation.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. DRIVER. The local communities have never asked him to relieve them from one dollar's worth of responsibility for the foundations for the levees or the land for the material that entered into it. The bill the gentleman refers to is a bill where protection that was afforded had been withdrawn.

Mr. SNELL. That is true, but it was the same principle that went with all that Flood Control Act. The gentleman and I were both here, and the gentleman knows that was the principle contained in that act—that local communities should furnish the land. Why should you not have carried it in this act? This is going too far. I am not opposed to flood control; but to bring in a bill for $370,000,000, with a potential $130,000,000 more, and sixty or seventy million dollars to be added to that, is going too far. It is the straw that is breaking the camel's back. The day is coming when you people will regret, simply on account of numbers, that you forced this legislation through the House.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. This act provides that the local interest must furnish the rights-of-way. It is identical with what is contained in the Flood Control Act.

Mr. SNELL. And in addition to that it has this exception: That the Secretary of War may change that. It is not a definite statement. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. That is the identical language of the Flood Control Act of 1928.

Mr. SNELL. Why did not you put it exactly the same and not make that exception?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. It is the same with that exception.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON].

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to use the full 5 minutes. It is unfortunate that this bill is brought in at such an inopportune time. I want to pay tribute and compliment our Chairman of the Flood Control Committee, who has worked hard on this legislation. I feel the bill is entitled to more consideration than it is going to get in the closing hours of this session of Congress. You have heard a great deal of discussion today as to why we have this bill here. I believe I know why we have it here. At any rate, at the first meeting of the Flood Control Committee we were presented with a report that had been submitted to the National Planning Commission with a large number of projects—river work, harbor work, Federal buildings, and other projects that were listed as projects that might be available for important labor and work relief. That is one of the reasons the bill is here. It was submitted to us at that time. These projects have not been recommended in a number of instances by the Chief of Engineers, but they are worthy projects. They are projects that carry benefits locally and they are of economic value to the State and Nation. Therefore, as we consider these projects, let us consider them today upon the basis of helping the entire Nation in a comprehensive flood-control program. If we are going to spend this money let us get something useful for it. We might go into it and check into the individual projects, but I dare say that very few of these projects will be constructed even if we pass this authorization today. In the first place we have to meet the requirements of the P. W. A., and reservoirs are of such nature that it is practically impossible to meet P. W. A. requirements. I am going to offer an amendment when the proper time comes that will permit the Federal Government to furnish rights-of-way.

The flood-control problem is a national problem and there are only a few States whose State laws are such that they can furnish rights-of-way.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT].

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that I was unavoidably detained from the floor of the House earlier this afternoon when the able and genial gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY], graciously yielded me 3 minutes to speak on the adoption of the rule for the consideration of this bill. However, I am happy now and grateful to my other colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], who has generously yielded me 5 minutes.

It is very seldom that I am forced to disagree with my own distinguished floor leader [Mr. SNELL], and I always dislike to do so, but having served on the Flood Control Committee of the House, and at the present time being a vice president of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, I am constrained to support this legislation, for three outstanding reasons. First, I think the surveys, investigations, and reports of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army show that these proposed projects are engineeringly feasible and economically justified. Anyone who has ever served on the Committee on Flood Control of this House and has gone through different sections of the country as it has been my privilege to do, who has seen with his own eyes waters, turbulent and torrential, roll over bridges and wash away houses, injure soil by washing it away, destroy crops, and drown not only livestock but human life, will realize the importance and necessity for this legislation. It is not a local matter, but it is national in its scope.

I have not seen all of these proposed projects, but personally I have seen many of them in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana. If this legislation is passed I think it is a step in the right direction, which will eventually save the people of this country not only hundreds of human lives but hundreds upon hundreds of millions of dollars in property.

My second reason for supporting this legislation is that this is only an authorization and, because we have the assurance at this particular time, if and when the appropriations are made they will be out of the $4,880,000,000 fund which Congress handed as a blank check to the President last January. God knows, I want to say to my Republican friends, I had rather see this money spent in permanent projects for flood control, protection of life and property than to see it spent on bedbug inspectors, Indian mound hunters, rag-doll makers, toe dancers, opera singers, and other senseless projects. This is not a gift, but it is a sound investment. [Applause.]

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I am in thorough accord with the gentleman's views. I feel we should spend more money for this conservation method rather than wasting money on such insane projects as the Matanuska colony in Alaska and other colonies on which we are wasting money.

Mr. SHORT. I agree with the gentleman's opinion. However, there is another reason I am interested in this bill. I will say frankly that there is a project in my particular district that is of vital importance. [Applause and laughter.] Not only to my people but also to me. [More laughter.] Because certain members of the Flood Control Committee assured me that they will accept an amendment which will be offered by my distinguished colleague [Mr. WOOD], who lives just north of me and who has cooperated with the Springfield Chamber of Commerce, which has fought for the building of Table Rock Dam on White River just north of the Arkansas line, in the land of a million smiles, in Taney County, Mo., which will create a lake 60 miles long in Stone and Barry Counties, with more than 1,200 miles of shore line, and will prevent the destructive flood waters rushing down upon the people in lower Arkansas in the district of my good friend Mr. MILLER, I naturally will have to vote for this bill. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RICH. I yield the gentleman one-half minute in order to ask him a question. To have a project of that kind in the gentleman's district it is worth while talking for the bill, is it not? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, it has been intimated to the members of this committee that this bill has been jumped up and proposed to this House without any real rime or reason and brought in here without due and proper consideration.

I hold in my hand one of the two volumes of hearings held by our committee. We have met almost continuously since the beginning of Congress and have gone over these projects. The bill as presented to the House today carries out the recommendations of the report of the Mississippi Valley Commission as made to the Public Works Administration.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I cannot yield now.

It also carries out the recommendation of the Natural Resources Board, which was made in this voluminous volume to the President. This committee has made a thorough study of the whole flood-control problem in the United States.

This bill is the first attempt that has been made to solve this complete flood-control problem. When I first came to Congress I asked the Chief of Army Engineers to tell me how much money had been spent on the lower Mississippi in the last 10 years, and I found that $325,000,000 has been spent dredging the lower Mississippi, taking the soil that comes from the Western States and the Northwest and piling it on the banks and raising that Mississippi River higher and higher. I am for adequate protection in the lower Mississippi, but I think the time has come when we should recognize the fact that the place to control and store these waters is on the tributaries of the headwaters of these rivers.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. If we start at the upper end by building dams and reservoirs, they will not need such high levees in the lower valley? [Applause.]

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct. I want to make this plain also, that this $325,000,000 that has been spent on the lower Mississippi was spent under legislation passed by the Republican administration. They graciously recognized the big problem that existed in the South. Now, are we going to let that $325,000,000 be wasted by not continuing to solve the problem by building reservoirs that will make these works worth while? Are we going to lie down and say, "We have spent $325,000,000, but we cannot afford to spend any more money to insure its effectiveness"? That is what you do if you do not go ahead and build these reservoirs and keep that water out of the lower Mississippi. [Applause.]

To make this a little plainer, I live in a semiarid region. I am on a river that is a tributary of the Arkansas River. For 9 months at a time it is a dry, sandy bed.

Then we will get a downpour of rain, and a wall of water will come down that river, destroying the farms, buildings, and improvements along its banks for 800 miles. Where does this water go? It goes down to make backwater, to make stagnant swamps, to waste a lot of the fertile valley of the Mississippi. What we are asking here today is that this water be retained up in the arid regions where we need it, where we have to use it for human beings and animals. If we do not keep our water table up, we are going to face an acute agricultural shortage in this country in a short time.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. No; I will not yield to the gentleman, for I do not think he wants to help me at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. DITTER. I yielded to the gentleman when I had the floor.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DITTER. In view of the merits the gentleman claims for this program, I assume he will support the effort on this side to have this money taken out of the $4,800,000,000 allotment?

Mr. FERGUSON. Rather than that, I may say I am so sincere in my conviction of the merit of this program that I would even be willing to see the money needed for it paid by future generations if it is not taken out of the work-relief fund. I am not going to quibble over that at all. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ZIMMERMAN].

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I represent the Tenth District of Missouri. I think my district has suffered more from the ravages of floods on the streams that flow through it than any other district of our country.

Flood control is a national program, and the situation which is destroying the resources of our country ought to challenge the attention of the American people and their representatives in the Congress. We all know that millions of dollars of property are destroyed every year in the valleys of our country, to say nothing of the loss of lives of people and the misery they have suffered. Mr. Chairman, the valleys of our country represent the food basket of the Nation. In the St. Francis Valley, in which my district is located, we have in the last 15 years suffered from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 in destruction of property and crops annually. This year we suffered three floods, which have practically devastated this fertile valley which contributes so much to the food supply of this Nation.

We talk about recovery; until we do something to conserve the rich valleys which grow the crops and the food of the people of this country in time of peace as well as in time of war we shall never reach that degree of prosperity, contentment, and happiness which we deserve. Mr. Chairman, the flood-control plan which this committee has evolved has for its objective this very purpose. I want to say to those on the right and to those on the left that this committee has studied out a plan whereby we are seeking to solve this problem in a comprehensive way. We are providing for reservoirs, reservoirs on the Black River, which runs through my district, reservoirs on the St. Francis River, which runs through my district, works which will hold the water back and save the valley below from destruction.

When this project is completed it will lower the flood crest of the lower Mississippi and we shall not be called upon to spend millions as we are called upon under existing conditions, for there will be adequate flood control.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who speak on this bill may have permission to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, in the time that it has been my privilege to serve as a Member of this House I have never seen a bill brought into the House in the shape this one is. River and harbor bills have always been accompanied with the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers as to what should be done. Always there have been hearings on bills of this character going into the projects in detail and describing them so we might understand what we are expected to do. In the instance of the pending bill, however, there are no hearings. I have asked for them at the desk, but I can get no information. All we have is the desire of different Members that millions and millions of dollars be placed in the bill to take care of flood conditions they think exist in their districts, without proper consideration, without the slightest thought paid to the interests of the Treasury of the United States. I do not believe that the Treasury of the United States can stand the strain of further drains upon it. I believe that if we do not place a check on ourselves and stop this wild expenditure of funds we will be unable to meet our obligations and our financial structure will collapse completely just as the financial structures of other countries have collapsed under similar circumstances.

When this bill is finished and all the amendments have been tacked on, it will call for $450,000,000 or $470,000,000. It is absolutely ridiculous to pile up these great expenditures.

Now, let me tell you another thing. The relief bill that was passed on the 8th of April provided that there should be $350,000,000 expended for flood control if the President might want it.

The President can do all this sort of thing if he thinks it is necessary or wise. Why should we say, as has been suggested here, that there shall be $350,000,000 spent in that way and $350,000,000 or $450,000,000 expended beyond that by further appropriations of Congress? When the proper time comes I propose to offer an amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read the amendment at this time for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER (read for information): On page 1, line 5, after the word "prosecuted" insert "and completed under allotment for that purpose out of the funds appropriated in a joint resolution making appropriations for relief purposes approved April 8, 1935."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I hope when that amendment is offered it will be adopted. I also hope that this bill will not be passed because never have we been asked to consider measures of this kind without any recommendation whatever from the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. Does the gentleman know whether or not this fund has been included in any Budget estimate?

Mr. TABER. It has not been.

Mr. DITTER. Have any suggestions been made to the Appropriations Committee that this might be included in a program to be budgeted in the future?

Mr. TABER. There has not been any such suggestion.

Mr. DITTER. From the gentleman's knowledge of the fiscal affairs of the country, will he give us the benefit of his opinion with regard to the danger of this loose fiscal policy?

Mr. TABER. I believe we are in great danger of such fiscal policy on the part of the Government leading us to disaster right now.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I can see that if the present program of expenditures is followed through we may have a deficit of $7,000,000,000 for the current fiscal year.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Has the gentleman any knowledge as to whether or not the money could be paid out of the $4,000,000,000?

Mr. TABER. It could be, if the President would make the allotment.

Mr. HALLECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. As a member of the Appropriations Committee, what would be the gentleman's idea as to the action the committee would take in the event this bill is passed? Would they feel required to make each and every appropriation contemplated in this bill?

Mr. TABER. If that is done after the next election takes place, they would not appropriate any money, because the public sentiment is not going to be in favor of such practices.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, as I understand this bill, there is nothing in it to require the administration to build or construct these projects out of funds previously appropriated for public works. On the other hand, if we defeat this bill the administration could still construct these projects out of funds appropriated for public works.

Mr. Chairman, there does not seem to me to be any rime or reason for the enactment of this legislation. The administration is not compelled under the provisions of this bill to use funds appropriated under the public-works bill, and this being merely an authorization, in the event these projects are not constructed with these funds, the Members of the House who are interested in the various projects contained in the bill can come before the House at the next session of Congress and ask for appropriations in the proper appropriation bills to build these projects, because this bill constitutes an authorization. Therefore, we are not assured whether or not this is going to cost the Government $460,000,000 in addition to the money that has already been allocated for this purpose in the public-works bill or whether these projects will be constructed out of these funds, with no additional cost.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. Is there any reason why the Congress should not express its opinion as to where this work is to be done?

Mr. BOILEAU. The opinion means nothing. The administration is not bound to accept that opinion. They could allocate the $280,000,000 which has been appropriated in the Public Works bill to these projects in addition to this authorization; then the Members of the House who are interested in these projects could come back here next year and use this authorization to get an additional appropriation in the amount of $460,000,000. I maintain this is an improper way to legislate. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of the time.

Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Members of the House to a statement made this afternoon by the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. BUCHANAN]. He made the statement that this Congress has now appropriated over $10,300,000,000—$10,300,000,000, think of it. Think it over. Where are you going to get the money? Where are you going to get the money?

Members of the House are making fun of that statement, but every one of you will see the day, and it will not be very far distant, until you will rue it. We are asked this afternoon to appropriate $470,000,000 more, and the Members of the House who are standing here speaking for this bill are doing so because there will be added amendments which will be offered to the bill, providing $16,000,000 for the St. Francis, $48,000,000 for the Yazoo River, and $14,000,000 for the Table Rock, and other amendments. Do you wonder why this is called a "pork barrel" bill?

Since I have been in Congress I have seen nothing like it.

I may say to the Members of the Congress, and I say it whether you are on the Republican side or on the Democratic side, this is the most serious moment in the history of the country. You are getting reports from the people back home that they do not like the tax bill, and you are going to be compelled within the next few years to increase your taxes three or four times what you have increased them now, and then you will really hear from your constituents. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON].

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, many lives and at least $300,000,000 are the annual flood losses in the United States that could be prevented.

This is a national question and only the National Government can solve the problem of flood control. For the first time we have under consideration legislation that provides for a national solution of this problem.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said about this bill being a pork-barrel measure. Let me say that the corps of engineers in all streams where surveys were made under the Rivers and Harbor Act of 1927 were asked to select those projects where the costs of construction would be less than the benefits resulting from such construction, and every one of those projects is embodied in the bill we have under consideration.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. In just a moment I shall be pleased to yield.

I may say in this connection that under the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933 it was required that river and harbor projects should only be those that had been approved by Congress or recommended by the Chief of Engineers. There has not been any flood-control projects approved by Congress except on two rivers.

The net result was that under that act last year and in 1933 there were no flood-control projects to amount to anything in the United States. Now, under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, $4,800,000,000 was appropriated to relieve unemployment. It has been stated that $350,000,000 was allocated to flood control. The statement is erroneous. It was allocated to flood control, rivers and harbors, soil erosion, sanitation, and miscellaneous projects.

Mr. Chairman, we were deprived of flood relief under the National Industrial Recovery Act when this Congress appropriated $3,300,000,000. In the actual execution of the Emergency Relief Act of 1935 the States and the Territories in need of flood control to prevent loss of life and loss of property are to be denied flood control because the projects have not been authorized by Congress.

I make the statement that, so far as I know, under the $4,800,000,000 appropriation, no flood-control projects of any consequence have been authorized and we have been given to understand that none will be authorized because the Congress of the United States has not approved them.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I will yield in just a moment. I want to make an analysis of the bill first.

What is the basis for this bill? The following statement will give us the foundation for it:

> Investigations and improvements of rivers and other waterways of the country for flood control and for other purposes are in the interest of the general welfare of the United States and the Federal Government should improve or participate in improvements of streams for flood control and other purposes if the benefits to whomsoever they may accrue are in excess of estimated costs, and if the lives and social security of the people are affected and the interests of the Federal Government are particularly involved in any such improvements which may be impracticable of initiation or of execution except by the Federal Government on account of competitions of relationships between States, their political subdivisions, or other local organizations.

It has been correctly stated that this legislation is merely an authorization, but it will enable those projects which have been carefully examined by the Corps of Engineers to be considered by the Works Progress Administration. There is a total estimated cost of $375,000,000. Otherwise they will not be constructed unless Congress makes appropriations for the projects.

Ours is a great country. There is nothing mandatory in the bill but the local interests are required to contribute substantially one-third of the amount of the total cost. They must provide for the lands, the locations, the structures, and they must agree to maintain the works.

Now, there were some projects inserted in the bill where the Corps of Engineers did not report that the benefits equaled or exceeded the costs. I recall most vividly that my good friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], with his constituents, the mayors of his cities, the editors of his papers, came before us and said, "We are now in desperate straits. We are unable to protect the lives of our people and our property. Our project has not had an opportunity to be examined by the Chief of Engineers, but we ask that these projects be included." There were three of these projects included, but before there could be any work done the Works Progress Administration must approve or the Congress of the United States must make an appropriation. The Appropriations Committee would certainly be satisfied that there was a Federal interest and that the benefits would exceed the costs of construction. Moreover, I submit that in those comparatively few cases that were inserted by Members both on and off the committee, the Works Progress Administration would not authorize the improvements, unless the hearings disclosed that the benefits resulting would be in excess of the cost, or at least equal the costs.

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. In just a moment. Let me say this in further analysis of this bill, that so far as flood control is concerned—and I am speaking to the Representatives of the 48 States, and I have given this subject careful study—unless the Congress of the United States authorizes flood-control projects where the Corps of Engineers have reported that the benefit will be greater than the costs or at least equal the cost, but few projects will be approved by the Works Progress Administration. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired. All time has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Clerk will read the bill in full.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following works of improvement of rivers, harbors, and other waterways for flood-control purposes are hereby adopted and authorized, to be prosecuted unless herein otherwise provided under the direction of the Secretary of War and supervision of the Chief of Engineers, in accordance with the plans, in the respective reports and records hereinafter designated, that correspond to the costs given herein for each project: Provided, That the authorization for each project shall be the cost given herein for such project.

SEC. 2. Except when authorized by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, no money appropriated under authority of this act shall be expended on the construction of any project until States or responsible local interests have given assurances satisfactory to the Secretary of War that they will (a) provide without cost to the United States all rights in land and other property necessary for the construction of the project; (b) hold and save the United States free from damages in connection with the construction works; (c) maintain and operate all the works after completion in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COOPER of Tennessee: Page 53, after line 16, add a new paragraph, as follows:

"Obion River, Hatchie River, and Forked Deer River, and its tributaries, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Mississippi, channel improvements, data in office of Chief of Engineers; cost, $285,000."

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is a very worthy project. Investigation and survey have been made and the data are on file in the Office of the Chief of Engineers. I have conferred with the chairman of the committee and I understand from him that he accepts this amendment.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman speaks of this project as being for deepening the channel of the river. Is it for the purpose of flood control or for the purpose of navigation?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. It is flood control, just like the rest.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk, and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIMMERMAN: Insert a new paragraph after the Cooper amendment, as follows:

"St. Francis River in Missouri and Arkansas; for flood control by levees and/or levees and reservoirs to protect 1,225,200 acres of land: House Document No. 159, Seventy-first Congress, second session, and committee document no. 1, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session; estimated cost, $16,000,000."

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I understand this amendment has the approval of the chairman of the committee and that there is no objection to it.

Mr. RICH. Was this approved by the Army Engineers?

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Yes. They state they intend to begin work on this project within a few weeks.

Mr. RICH. And it is to cost $16,000,000?

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, after line 24, insert the following new paragraph:

"YAZOO RIVER BASIN

"Yazoo River and tributaries, Mississippi flood-control project, seven detention reservoirs for flood control, described in House Document 198, Seventy-third Congress, second session, according to plans and recommendations of the Chief of Engineers in his report of February 12, 1935, printed in House Flood Control Committee Document No. 1, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, $48,000,000: Provided, That the reservoirs for control, headwaters flow of the Yazoo River and tributaries may be located by the Chief of Engineers, in his discretion: And provided further, That the Chief of Engineers may, in his discretion, substitute levees, floodways, or auxiliary channels, or any or all of them for any or all of the seven detention reservoirs recommended in his report of February 12, 1935, for the control of floods of the Yazoo River."

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, this project in the amendment I have offered, I understand, is satisfactory to the chairman of the committee and to the ranking Member on the minority side. It is on all fours with the amendment just adopted respecting the St. Francis River in Arkansas and Missouri. This project is recommended by the Chief of Engineers in a report, House Flood Control Committee Document No. 1, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, dated February 12, 1935, and is in exact accordance, not only with his report but with his testimony before the Committee on Flood Control. It provides the contributions that the local interests must make as provided in the report. I understand the amendment is acceptable to the chairman.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. How much does it cost?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Forty-eight million dollars for the entire project, if it is completed.

Mr. TABER. I should think while the getting was good the gentleman would get $100,000,000.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am following the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers. I understood the amendment was satisfactory to the gentleman on the minority side, just as the St. Francis project was satisfactory.

Mr. RICH. I will say to the gentleman that project is as worthy as the other projects.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I may say that the occasion for this amendment, as I said, is that it is exactly the same as the amendment for the St. Francis River that has just been adopted by the committee. It involves 7 reservoirs or 7 units at an average cost of about $7,000,000 each. One of them may be established. Others may or may not be built. It may be years before the others are established, but the entire project is recommended by the Chief of Engineers. I submit that this is a project involving one of the principal tributaries of the Mississippi River. It has been considered by the Corps of Engineers for years. They have submitted their reports. This amendment is in exact accord with their recommendations. This is one of the most important projects that the committee has considered. It involves protection of 2,000,000 acres of land and 700,000 people. It was considered in connection with the Mississippi River bill, and recommended by the Chief of Engineers in connection with that bill, which is still pending in the committee, and, with the exception of two members, the members of the committee have indicated that they favored the project and these two members asked that in connection with the Mississippi River bill the same provisions in the Yazoo River bill be made applicable to the Arkansas and White Rivers, although lands along said rivers do not pay taxes for flood works on the Mississippi River.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the amendment.

The gentleman who spoke a moment ago, Mr. ZIMMERMAN, and I are in hearty accord on the fundamentals of flood control. For one reason I expressed sometime ago, I happened to know a little about this water business, having been water supply commissioner of the State of Pennsylvania. I visited every watershed in the State and some other States. That is the reason I have an opinion, and had that opinion and expressed it here, well in advance of this bill. I talked about it and gave expression to that thought on the floor of this House long ago.

Some of you are right about the place to stop these flood waters. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ZIMMERMAN] and I had a personal conversation about it, and we are in hearty accord. This plan does not restrain the water. They talk about levees. What does a levee do? A levee can only direct the course of the water. It does not restrain it. Now, here is a sample. If the rest of this bill is anything like this Susquehanna Basin proposal, it does not amount to much. I call your attention to something that is absolutely fundamental, that you will have to get to before you stop the flow of that flood water down the Mississippi, which destroys vast property. This is the point. I would not vote against a bill that had anything in it for the benefit of the people of Williamsport, of Jersey Shore, of Muncy, of Harrisburg, of Sunbury, or York, for they are worthy communities evidently deceived as to this flood-control farce. Of course, York is not on any river, but they have it in the bill. They have here $1,700,000 for York. That is not on any river at all.

Mr. HAINES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HAINES. We have the Cadorus River running right through the city.

Mr. FOCHT. Oh, that is a little creek running right alongside of the city. That is not any river and is on the map as Cadorus Creek. I am surprised that the gentleman would endorse this. Instead of talking about restraining the water at Williamsport and on down the river, the place to make the basins is from Williamsport on up north into the mountain headwaters. Then you do not have a basin on the whole north branch nor anything said about the big towns and cities up that way, which is half of the stream after it leaves Sunbury; nor is anything said about Milton and Northumberland on the east bank, nor New Columbia, West Milton, Lewisburg, and Selinsgrove on the west bank of the Susquehanna. If you had seen that tide come down there in 1889 and in 1894, I should like to know what any such thing as a levee would do at Williamsport or Muncy or Sunbury to hold the Susquehanna. This is the most absurd proposition I ever heard of. No engineer ever endorsed such a program as building a levee to restrain the water around Williamsport or Muncy or Sunbury to protect Lock Haven. You have to build dikes and dams and restraining basins above those places up in the mountains, where the tributary streams come down. That is what you will do on the Mississippi some time. You ought to send this bill back and let somebody sit down and cut it to pieces and put in one big project that means something and delete the "pork barrel" features, even if it costs a billion dollars, but there is no sense to this kind of a bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert a letter I received today from a farmer friend in Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

ALLENWOOD, PA., August 20, 1935.

Hon. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Having noted your vote on the potato-control bill, please accept my congratulations. You voted not as a Republican or Democratic partisan but as a true American.

The bill passed, but if the farmers of Pennsylvania allow it to be enforced in this State, they are entirely unworthy of their liberty-loving forebears. If they do, they sell their birthright for a mess of pottage.

I remember in discussing the Bankhead cotton-control bill with you about a year ago you made the remark that the Pennsylvania farmer would be next. That prophecy has come true. He is on the spot right now.

My thought is that many of the farmers do not realize what is being done to them.

Fourteen crops are under Government control now, and the time is not far distant when the farmer will be told what and how much he can plant in each field on his farm. His state will be that of a serf, and his overlord will be the Government's representative for the district. He will have the right to pay the taxes unless the Government decides to confiscate his property.

I wish the farmers could be made to realize the probable results of the new deal if carried to its logical conclusion.

With best regards, I am,

Yours sincerely,

C. V. MICHENER.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCLELLAN to the amendment offered by Mr. WHITTINGTON: Strike out "$48,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$36,000,000."

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I think this legislation is worthy of our consideration and I think some good will come from it, but I do not expect immediate relief or that we shall come to the end of the rainbow of promise with reference to flood control through the passage of this legislation.

I have offered an amendment to the pending amendment to reduce the amount from $48,000,000 to $36,000,000. The reason I just made the statement that I doubted seriously we were going to get the results we expected from this bill is because the bill requires that local interests furnish the right-of-way, the lands where these reservoirs are to be built; and in many of those instances where it is expected that results will be accomplished local interests will not be able to furnish the rights-of-way and, therefore, the improvement will not be made.

While that is true, I point out to you that in this instance the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi carries $12,000,000 to pay for the land.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is not that the identical provision in the case of the St. Francis?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not know anything about the St. Francis. It is not the same as the conditions imposed on the other projects reported in this bill.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. It is the same provision that is made with reference to the St. Francis and the Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That is not true as to the Arkansas River projects. Now, I ask just what the local interests have got to furnish, just what have they got to do? In this proposition out of the $48,000,000, $12,000,000 is to buy the land, and from the hearings before the Flood Control Committee it figures out as being more than $70 an acre.

All I ask you to do is to pass a bill here that gives all of us the same treatment. I ask you to strike $12,000,000 from this amendment that it is proposed to use to pay for these lands and let these people go to the Army Engineers for approval as all the rest of us must go. In other words, place all the projects on the same basis.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The very provision the gentleman from Arkansas is speaking of will prevent unworthy projects being adopted, because the local interests will not supply the rights-of-way if the projects are not worthy.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the project to which he refers is given $12,000,000 by this amendment for the purpose of buying land for the project, but that similar treatment is not provided for other projects?

Mr. McCLELLAN. It applies to this project and to this project alone, and not to another one recommended or provided for in the original bill.

Mr. BOILEAU. How did that ever get by the committee?

Mr. McCLELLAN. It did not get by the committee; it is an amendment offered from the floor.

Mr. BOILEAU. I am asking for information. I understand the committee has agreed to this amendment. Is that true?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not know what the chairman of the committee did, but I know that the committee did not agree to it, because I am a member of the committee.

Mr. BOILEAU. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. ENGEL. Who is going to pay the processing tax on this pork? [Laughter.]

Mr. McCLELLAN. Whoever gets the pork, and I am trying to keep the gentleman from Mississippi from getting a larger slice than you or I. [Applause.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. The answer is, there is a bounty on pork here.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is a peculiar situation. We are told that the Flood Committee spent long weeks and probably months in the consideration of this bill. They have brought in a bill recommending certain projects to the House. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] is the ranking majority Member on the Flood Control Committee. He is the man, I am advised, who dictates the policies of the committee. Now, he has sat through the hearings of this committee during all this time. If this were a meritorious project why did not the gentleman from Mississippi have it included in the bill when it came to the House for consideration?

Let me say that I favor the passage of this bill, seriously favor it. I think it is good legislation, but I object to Members coming in and attempting to load this bill with outrageous amendments for outrageous sums of money which will kill the bill on its final passage or which if they do not kill the bill on final passage will kill the bill when it reaches the White House for signature of the President. I hope you Members who are in sympathy with this legislation, who think the bill brought out by the Flood Control Committee was a good bill, will stand by that bill as it was reported, irrespective of the fact that the chairman of the committee now accepts this amendment, because I say to you again, had this project had as much merit as the gentleman now says it has, it would have been in the bill when the bill was reported. I trust the House will vote down this amendment and every other amendment.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I want to say this to the gentleman that although the chairman may endorse this the committee has not endorsed it.

Mr. NICHOLS. I am glad to hear that the committee does not endorse it.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BOILEAU moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, may I say to the Members of the House that this is not offered as a pro forma amendment. I am offering the motion in all seriousness because in my humble opinion a situation has developed that is the most disgraceful I have ever seen in my 5 years' Membership in this House. [Applause.]

Various Members have spoken in favor of the bill because of a particular project in their district or State. I am satisfied that some Members are supporting this legislation who would under no circumstances support the legislation unless their State had been given some consideration.

I do not mean this as an attack upon any particular individual, and I sincerely hope that no individual Member will interpret it as a reflection upon him. We see amendments covering these projects offered from the floor and accepted without adequate consideration. They are put into the bill and involve millions of dollars. They have not even been considered by the committee.

Mr. Chairman, we have here a bill reported by the committee containing over 100 projects on which a report has not been made by the War Department. To be exact, there are 139 projects contained in this bill which have not been approved by the War Department; upon which the War Department has not made a favorable recommendation.

Mr. Chairman, in my humble opinion it is an outrage for the House of Representatives to give consideration to this piece of legislation with the Membership of the House in the frame of mind in which it is at the present time. I am in no sense of the word trying to admonish anyone. I have only my own conscience and my own conduct to be accountable for. But I sincerely hope the Members of the House will not accept this as a pro forma motion, and will vote to recommit this bill with instructions to strike out the enacting clause and in that way kill the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to make no statement which is not borne out by the record. I am not asking for anything for the Yazoo River system that has not been granted in the case of the St. Francis River. With respect to the $48,000,000 costs, may I say, as I understand, that every item in this bill gives the total cost of the project. The total cost of the Yazoo River project, according to the Chief of Engineers, is $48,000,000, and the local interests will be required to provide certain rights-of-way. They will be required to maintain them in this case just as in the case of the St. Francis River in Arkansas, and other rivers in this bill.

I stated a few minutes ago that the Flood Control Committee considered the Yazoo and St. Francis projects in connection with the Mississippi River. It was thought that the Mississippi River bill would be reported this session. I did not say that all members of the committee had agreed to accept the amendment. I stated the chairman and the ranking minority member of the committee agreed to accept the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat, I am not asking on behalf of Mississippi anything that has not been granted to other States. I would like to have the Federal Government do the work without any local contribution whatever. There were cases where it was stated the land would cost $70 an acre, but in the great number of cases the cost will run maybe $3, $4, or $5 an acre, according to the testimony, and except for reservoirs, only flowage rights would be necessary.

With respect to Arkansas, may I say that there is in this bill not 7 reservoirs but 13 for the Arkansas River, costing not $48,000,000 but $64,000,000. Let me say again there is in the bill for the White River in the State of Arkansas and Missouri $63,000,000 for 13 reservoirs. These projects ought to be passed on by the Chief of Engineers, and I am saying only projects have been presented to the House that have either been considered by the committee or reported by the Corps of Engineers on streams where the benefits equal or exceed the cost. I want to say, furthermore, that the Chief of Engineers states that in connection with the Yazoo River project the local interests have expended $20,000,000 for flood-control projects. They pay in addition for protection from the floods of the Mississippi River. I am not complaining about the Arkansas or White River projects. I do not raise a voice against Arkansas being included so that their projects may be submitted. If the Arkansas River and the White River are given 13 reservoirs, each costing $127,000,000, then it is fair to make adequate provision for the Yazoo River, the annual flood losses of which often amount to millions of dollars. Moreover, I supported the St. Francis project and I cannot understand how any Representative of Arkansas could oppose the similar Yazoo River project.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOILEAU) there were—ayes 52, noes 98.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. WILSON of Louisiana and Mr. BOILEAU.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 60, noes 107.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported?

The Clerk again read the McClellan amendment to the Whittington amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NICHOLS) there were—ayes 89, noes 18.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARLSON: On page 2, strike out lines 3 to 14, inclusive, and insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That in the construction of reservoirs for flood control the Federal Government, on recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, is authorized to furnish rights-of-way, easements, and flowage rights, except flowage of highways: Provided, That the States or responsible local interests shall give satisfactory assurance that they will (a) undertake without cost to the United States all alterations of highways made necessary because of the construction of the reservoirs and meet all damages because of such highway alterations; (b) maintain and operate all the works after completion in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War."

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to use the entire 5 minutes. We might just as well face the issue now as any other time. This is a new, comprehensive method of flood control in the construction of reservoirs, and there are only a few States in the Union that can take advantage of this program, because their State laws are such that they cannot furnish rights-of-way. I offer this amendment so that a number of States can take advantage of flood control, and these rights-of-way will be furnished only on projects that have the recommendation only of the Chief of Engineers. This is to be a new flood-control program. I offer this amendment in all sincerity, and I see no reason why we should not assist in this needed relief.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there is no project in this bill, including the St. Francis amendment, that authorizes the purchase of rights-of-way. I would hate to see this policy changed in this piece of legislation. As long as the bill contains the provision that local interests must furnish the rights-of-way we are going to be guaranteed that there will be no projects constructed unless they are worth while.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. CARLSON. Did the gentleman make the statement that the rights-of-way were not included in the St. Francis? I have just read the St. Francis amendment, and I do not interpret that amendment as providing for any rights-of-way.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Local interests furnish the rights-of-way.

Mr. NICHOLS. I just spoke to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ZIMMERMAN], and he told me he thought it did include them.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. The local interests themselves pay for the rights-of-way.

Mr. FERGUSON. Absolutely. There is no such provision in the bill, and the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] was voted down because it did provide for the Federal Government to furnish rights-of-way. I think this must be kept in the bill in order to be a guaranty that everybody will not come in and have these projects built at the entire expense of the Federal Government. There is a safety valve in the bill now that forces the local interests to provide the rights-of-way, to hold the Federal Government free from all damages during construction, and to accept, maintain, and operate these projects after they are constructed. Undoubtedly this provision should be kept in the bill, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas must be voted down. I hope the Committee will stay with me and refuse to accept any more projects in this bill and not adopt any amendment to this measure that has not had the careful consideration of the committee for seven long months.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. All I wish to say is that if there ever was any merit to this bill, and I do not claim very much for it, you should not permit this amendment to go into the bill, because it is loading it up to the full extent for having the Federal Government do all the work. I do hope that the Membership of the House will vote this amendment down.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. May I have the attention of the House for a moment? These are the closing days of Congress. The House is thoughtless, noisy, careless. We are doing something that we will regret. A few years ago I stood on the floor of this House about 2 o'clock in the morning, under similar circumstances, when a river and harbor bill was under consideration and heard Member after Member offer amendments which should not have been placed in the bill. It was common talk by those who were opposed to the bill that we were loading the bill down so that it would be destroyed, and, as a result of that hilarity, an amendment went into the bill carrying $50,000,000. That does not sound so very big to us in this Congress, but when we get back to sanity again it will mean as much as it did 7 years ago. That Congress in that thoughtless moment placed $50,000,000 on the backs of the taxpayers of this country. They did it as a jest. They thought it would kill the bills. Some of the people here now are thoughtlessly insisting on loading this bill for the purpose of killing it. That is not statesmanship. That is not what we are here for.

If we want to amend the bill, let us vote for such amendments only as will help it; and then if we are opposed to the bill, let us have the courage to stand up and vote against it. Let us not put anything in the bill that should not be in it, because if we do, we are going to rue the day. An exhibition such as this House is putting on tonight is disgraceful. It is now 8:15, and we have been in constant session since 12 o'clock. The House is in the wrong mood to be dealing in such a frivolous manner with the people's money. Let us adjourn or give some serious consideration to the matter before us.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] that in the closing hours of Congress very often amendments are put on bills that have not had mature consideration. On the other hand, there are some meritorious amendments and some meritorious bills passed in the last days of Congress. In the routine of our procedure here it is impossible to obtain consideration by the Congress of everything, even in the eleventh hour. My colleague from Florida, Mr. PETERSON, will soon offer an amendment to this bill which is as meritorious as any item contained in the bill or any item which has been passed on by the Congress. He will offer an amendment for an authorization of $30,000 for flood control in the Withlacoochee River, Fla.

The damage in this valley, which could have been obviated by the $30,000 appropriation last year to county roads and bridges, amounted to $6,000; to State roads and bridges, $30,000; railroads, $25,000; towns, $4,000; farms and growers, $125,000; timber and tie industry, $25,000; timber killed, $250,000—a total of $505,000 damage in this valley alone. It will be economy for this Congress to accept the decision of the engineers who have examined the project. The total proposed cost of the flood-control project in this valley amounts to only $30,000. I plead with the Members to place this item in the bill. It is the only item that my State will advance in this huge authorization bill. I trust the House will accept the amendment. The Withlacoochee is one of the most picturesque streams in the country, and the soil in the valley is fertile and productive. Hundreds of farms annually suffer floods which may by this appropriation be prevented. Waste and destruction can be greatly lessened through proper flood-control methods. The amendment is in the interest of ultimate economy for the American people. I plead for favorable action. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk reported the Carlson amendment.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment embraces striking out section 2. If agreed to, there is no sort of provision for the local interests contributing one cent for the construction of the numerous levees and rights-of-way in the bill. If this were an addition to section 2, I would not make the statement, because it would be an entirely different matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARY: Page 48, after the figures "$192,000", in line 23, insert the following paragraph:

"ROUGH RIVER IN KENTUCKY

"Such immediate works as to prosecute the construction of drift barriers, the straightening of the river channel and the construction of bank revetments, to effect a reduction in floods and erosion losses; no report to Congress; surveys completed and data in Office of Chief of Engineers; cost, $456,000."

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to take care of a flood condition that exists in the valley of Rough River, Ky., which is a tributary of Green River. This river passes through four counties in Kentucky, a distance of about 71 miles. It is flooding some fifty-odd thousand acres of the best and most fertile land in that valley. In 1929 a survey of that river basin was ordered. That survey was made by the Government engineers, and they made a report as to what should be done. About 40 years ago when there was a lot of timber in that valley, there was some navigation upon that river and the Government constructed a small dam about 7 miles above the mouth of Rough River. There is no navigation now and the report of the engineers shows that the dam is of no further value. The report is that this dam should be taken out and that the river in places ought to be straightened out that a lot of debris that has collected in the river should be taken out.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARY. I yield.

Mr. RICH. What is this going to cost?

Mr. CARY. Four hundred and fifty-six thousand dollars. It is worth a great deal to that valley. It will save a great territory in the country. I hope the Congress will see fit to adopt this amendment.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARY. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What is the report of the Corps of Engineers as to the comparative difference between the cost and the benefits?

Mr. CARY. They say its destructive effect now has cut the value of this land in half. They fixed the value of the land at $80, and it is now worth $40 an acre.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What is the relative cost and benefit? Will the benefits equal the cost?

Mr. CARY. Oh, they will far exceed the cost.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is that the report of the Army Engineers?

Mr. CARY. I cannot say, but I do know personally that this whole body of land has been destroyed.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words about the background of this bill. In my opinion, no bill has come before this Congress with a better background than this bill, if we do not overload it and kill it with amendments.

First, I want to say something with reference to the background of this legislation as it effects the Arkansas River Basin. Some years ago the Congress, by resolution, ordered the Army Engineers to make a thorough survey of the Arkansas River Basin and its tributaries. Three or four years were spent on that survey at a cost of four to five million dollars. It embraced navigation, flood control, soil erosion, reforestation, reclamation, and every physical feature of the Arkansas Valley Basin. I do not believe there is a project in this bill affecting the Arkansas Valley Basin and all of its tributaries that was not reported on and approved by the Army Engineers as a result of that survey.

Now, with reference to this legislation as a whole, the entire Mississippi Valley watershed or drainage area, all or parts of 31 States, embracing the entire heart of continental United States from the summit of the Rocky Mountains to the Allegheny Mountains, is involved. The Mississippi Valley Committee was set up under the Public Works Administration 2 years ago to consider that entire area and work out a program for its conservation and improvements. The Mississippi Valley Committee consisted of nine eminent engineers of national reputation, headed by Mr. Morris L. Cooke, of Philadelphia. There were only two western men on that committee. The other seven engineers were from the East. So far as I know, I believe that every main project in this bill between the Allegheny Mountains and the Rocky Mountains was examined and approved by the Mississippi Valley Committee. Not only that, they classified all these proposed projects. Class A, economically and engineeringly sound and feasible and ready for immediate execution; class B, having future value; class C, discarded. They not only classified all these projects, but they estimated the cost of them. They turned out the most wonderful report in the history of this Government. Every Member of this House ought to read that report. It is a physical history and survey of that great area of the United States and all of its resources and what should be done to conserve it. They proposed a great program of projects, many of which are embraced in this bill, as the beginning of a great conservation plan which must be carried out in the United States if the surface wealth of this country and its natural resources are to be saved from ultimate destruction. If every Member of this House had read that great report, every Member would vote for this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CARY) there were ayes 20 and noes 50.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CITRON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CITRON: Page 53, after line 16, add the following paragraph:

"Connecticut River Basin-flood control and protection on the Connecticut River by means of bank-protection works, channel enlargement, flood walls and dikes; survey and data in the office of the Chief of Engineers; cost, $1,000,000."

Mr. CITRON. Mr. Chairman, this is a very meritorious amendment. In 1927 there occurred a disastrous flood on the Connecticut River, affecting the States of Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. The flood damage in these States was estimated at $17,000,000. Since then the Army Engineers have made various surveys, both for power navigation and flood-control purposes. This amendment has to do solely with flood control.

At the time this bill was being drawn I asked the War Department to prepare a survey for flood control. When the bill was drafted and finally reported out by the committee the War Department, I believe, had not finished its work. Recently its engineers' department wrote me a letter telling about flood-control matters on this river. I desire to read this letter.

Mr. GRANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CITRON. I yield.

Mr. GRANFIELD. Is it not a fact that an initial flood-control survey of the Connecticut River has been made by the Army engineers of the War Department?

Mr. CITRON. It is.

Mr. GRANFIELD. Hearings were held in connection with the survey in Springfield, Hartford, Northampton, and other cities and towns in that particular locality.

Mr. CITRON. That is true.

Mr. GRANFIELD. As I understand it, engineers of the War Department are very much interested in flood control upon the Connecticut River.

Mr. CITRON. I believe so.

Mr. GRANFIELD. And the gentleman has a letter indicating that the War Department is very much interested in this project. I think, Mr. Chairman, it is a meritorious project and ought to be accepted by the Committee. It is a project that should be approved by the Committee.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CITRON. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What are the respective benefits according to the report of the Chief of Engineers or the letter the gentleman holds in his hand?

Mr. CITRON. I will read it. I procured it from the Engineer Department within the last few days.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I did not ask for that; I just asked for the benefits.

Mr. CITRON. It does not state the benefits. But certainly they are more than the costs. All that information is on file in the office of the War Department engineers.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What is the relative value of the benefits as compared with the cost of construction; are the benefits greater or less?

Mr. CITRON. The benefits are greater than the costs.

Mr. GRANFIELD. As I understand it your letter does not disclose the information. But there is information on file showing that such work as you suggest would aid employment and save New England from much damage to life and property in the future.

Mr. CITRON. The Army Engineers' office sent me this letter to show that they have made a survey. For months I have studied and worked upon this matter. I have given to it a great deal of my time. The chairman of this committee knows of my efforts. Several days ago I went over this subject with him and told him about my proposed amendment. I also kept after the War Department for some kind of a report. Finally they submitted to me this letter which I will read. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GRANFIELD] knows much about this subject. He has been of much assistance.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman read the letter?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GRANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CITRON. The letter reads as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, August 21, 1935.

Hon. WILLIAM M. CITRON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CITRON: In accordance with your request for information concerning possible flood-control projects on the Connecticut River, I am pleased to inform you that the office of the Chief of Engineers has plans and estimates for flood-control works on Connecticut River having a total cost of approximately $1,000,000.

In general, the plans provide for flood protection by means of bank-protection works, channel enlargement, flood walls, and dikes.

Very truly yours,

E. M. MARKHAM,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

We have many large and small cities on the Connecticut River. For example, the city of Hartford is located on this river. Across the river in East Hartford there occur floods. And they are troubled with floods in Massachusetts, Vermont, and New Hampshire. I believe, therefore, that this amendment is meritorious.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CITRON. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I also call attention to the fact that all of New England—in this bill—has an authorization of only $66,000.

Mr. CITRON. I thank the gentleman for this information; and it includes the States of Connecticut, Vermont, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, not merely one State.

Mr. GRISWOLD. What is the cost of the project proposed by the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. CITRON. $1,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PETERSON of Florida: Page 53, at the end of the bill, insert a new section, as follows:

"Withlacoochee River, Fla.; estimated cost $30,000 as per data on file with engineers; work to be done in discretion of Chief of Engineers."

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the Committee, this is for the purpose of taking care of flood control in what is known as "the Withlacoochee area." The report of the Chief of Engineers originally contemplated a much larger project. This is only for the purpose of clearing out the hyacinths and logs. It is estimated that an expenditure of $30,000 will save an annual loss of $505,000. We had hoped to get this under the Works Progress Administration, but they sent us to the Resettlement Administration, and from the Resettlement Administration we were sent back to the Army Engineers, and the great mass of red tape has greatly delayed a most deserving project where people need immediate relief.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I understand the cost is $30,000.

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. PETERSON of Florida. I wish to thank the chairman of the committee for this announcement.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCK: Insert the following paragraph at the end of line 23, on page 50:

"Middle River, Calif.: From Middle River to the San Joaquin River, Whiskey Slough, Latham Slough from Santa Fe Railroad to Stockton deep water channel and the Empire Cut, as described in House Document No. 481, Seventieth Congress, and House Document 48, Seventy-second Congress, with modifications to widen ways and strengthen the levees to protect against recurring floods and damages to lands and property; cost, $225,000."

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, as the Members have learned from listening to the amendment just read, these projects are all included in Document No. 48 of the Seventy-second Congress, first session. We are not asking for anything that has not been surveyed by the Army Engineers. We are asking for something that will be a real protection against flood waters.

The rivers, the Middle River and the various sloughs I mentioned, form parts of a very intricate canal system and the delta where the San Joaquin River comes down from the mountains, joining the Sacramento River before it pours into San Francisco Bay. The surrounding lands are protected by levees at the present time, but the floods have eroded these levees and are continuing to do so. Even this past spring serious damage has occurred throughout all of this territory.

Mr. Chairman, I feel very humble in coming here and asking for this very small appropriation after listening to requests here for millions of dollars.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What does the report of the Chief of Engineers say as to the relative cost and the construction benefits?

Mr. BUCK. The report of the Chief of Engineers was rendered in connection with the Rivers and Harbors Committee investigation and does not bear upon this particular matter.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The committee, I may say, considered only those projects that were brought in by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, what is this going to cost?

Mr. BUCK. It will cost $225,000. It will protect that portion of the country out there known as the "delta of California", lying around the San Joaquin River. This land is all subject to annual inundation by the San Joaquin River.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BUCK) there were ayes 33, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, we have been in session since 12 o'clock. It is now almost 9. I move that the Committee do now rise and that we postpone further consideration of the bill until tomorrow. I am sure the Members would like to have the opportunity to get some dinner.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. WEST. Mr. Chairman, I have two amendments to offer which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WEST: On page 7, strike out lines 16, 17, and 18 on that page.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEST. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The gentleman has offered two amendments, one of them to strike out the Galveston project and the other to strike out the Rio Grande River project?

Mr. WEST. That is correct.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. As I understand it, after this bill was reported the Galveston project was carried in the river and harbor bill?

Mr. WEST. Yes; and the Rio Grande project was carried in another bill already approved.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. And the gentleman's amendment strikes both of them from the bill?

Mr. WEST. The gentleman is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WEST].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WEST: On pages 7 and 8, strike out lines 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24 on page 7 and lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 8.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on all amendments close in 30 minutes.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I would like to have considered.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this bill and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] moves that all debate on the bill and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, such a motion is only in order when a bill is being read by sections and after an amendment has been offered. The motion is not in order at this stage.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provided for the reading of the entire bill, and the Chair holds that the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma is in order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move as a substitute for the pending motion, that all debate on all amendments close in 1 hour.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, was there not a fair and square agreement that if the reading of the bill were waived the Chair would recognize anyone who wanted to offer an amendment, pro forma or otherwise?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can recognize Members to offer amendments. The motion is to close debate on all amendments.

The question is on the substitute motion offered by the gentleman from New York for the motion offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma that debate on all amendments close in 1 hour.

The substitute motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma to close debate in 30 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. NICHOLS) there were—ayes 65, noes 52.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. NICHOLS and Mr. TABER.

The Committee again divided and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 103, noes 55.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 3, after line 10, insert: "Merrimac River, Concord, N. H.: Merrimac River, Concord, N. H., to the sea, flood control, channel clearing, sewage disposal, and water purification, House Document No. 649, Seventy-first Congress, third session; cost, $3,445,000."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I voted against the motion a few moments ago to restrict the time of debate, because I did not want to take the floor and have my time for debate and then have some other colleague not have the same amount of time. I therefore have asked the chairman to be recognized for only 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, Massachusetts, in this bill before the Citron amendment was passed, had only $66,000. The Citron amendment gives Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Vermont $1,066,000. I am asking for $3,445,000 for the Merrimac River, the headwaters of which are in New Hampshire, the river flowing through the cities of Concord and Manchester, in New Hampshire, and through Lowell, Lawrence, Haverhill, and Newburyport in Massachusetts, and then into the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. EKWALL. Does the gentleman think that will be enough, really?

Mr. CONNERY. No; it is a project of $9,000,000, but I have cut it to $3,000,000, in the hopes of having it included in this bill.

Mr. EKWALL. I think we ought to increase the amount.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 2 minutes in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to state to this House that these are power projects.

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, no.

Mr. FERGUSON. They are not flood-control projects and were so reported by the Army Engineers in their report.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, there is nothing about power in this at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNERY) there were—ayes 46, noes 81.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 1, line 5, after the word "prosecuted", insert "and completed only under allotment for that purpose which the President may make out of the funds appropriated in a joint resolution making appropriations for relief purposes, approved April 8, 1935."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment which I stated in general debate I intended to offer to find out whether the House is in good faith in expecting that this money will be spent out of the relief appropriation. It will fix it so that it can be done that way. There is plenty of money to cover it, if the President decides it ought to be done. I do not believe that we should appropriate any more money making a general charge on the Treasury for this flood-control proposition because there was allocated to that in the set-up of the bill as it finally passed $350,000,000. I hope this amendment will be adopted, so that we may have some respect as we go back into the House for the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, as I explained to this committee, that money may be had from the $4,000,000,000 appropriation, beginning with these projects, but we cannot make it mandatory. Three hundred and fifty million dollars were for soil erosion, reforestation, and all that, and some other things. Some of the projects here have been undertaken. They are meritorious and, as everybody admits, it will take from 3 to 5 years to complete some of them. It is the beginning of a program of comprehensive flood control, and the time may come when we need an appropriation for it before it is completed. I hope that it will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 55, noes 88.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD: Amend H. R. 8455, section 2, page 23, line 5, by adding the following after the comma at the end of line 5:

"Table Rock Reservoir, on White River, in Missouri: For flood control, hydroelectric development, soil erosion, and other incidental benefits; plans in House Document No. 102, Seventy-third Congress, first session; revised cost data in office of Chief of Engineers; cost, $14,286,000."

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee stated that only those projects recommended by the Army Engineers were accepted in this report. The report is all right as far as it goes, but in the White River Basin, of the 20 projects reported by the Army Engineers, Table Rock is in the center of this coordinated system.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is not the project on page 23, Wildcat Shoals Reservoir, on White River, a part of the project the gentleman has in mind?

Mr. WOOD. No; it is not. Wildcat Shoals is not a part of it at all, except that it is a part of the integrated system of flood control and hydroelectric development.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. It is in that vicinity.

Mr. WOOD. Yes; Table Rock is right in the center of this coordinated system of flood control and power development and without its development the system cannot be feasibly or economically complete.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. In the report of the Chief of Engineers it was considered a part of it, and this was the most meritorious part.

Mr. WOOD. Table Rock is the most meritorious part according to the Chief of Engineers and the report of the Mississippi Valley Commission. Read on page 184 of the report of the Mississippi Valley Commission, and Table Rock is given as no. 1 of the class A projects.

Of the 20 projects reported upon in the White River Basin Table Rock was at the top of the first five A projects listed. Most of the projects the committee has recommended are B projects. If we had had the Table Rock improvement in 1927, when we had that flood, we would have saved $11,000,000 which was lost as property damages from the flood, and in 1928 there was a loss of approximately $8,000,000.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. This will increase the appropriation on the White River from $66,000,000 to $81,000,000 in this bill.

Mr. WOOD. My amendment calls for $14,286,000. That is in accordance with the report of the Mississippi Valley Commission, and that is acquiesced in by the Army Engineers. I have a letter here from the Chief of Engineers, in which he gives his approval to this project.

Mr. SHORT. I think the gentleman should point out that this is the only provision on the White River in the State of Missouri.

Mr. WOOD. That is correct. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert, as a part of my remarks, this letter I received from Maj. Gen. E. M. Markham, Chief of Engineers, in which he gives his approval to the Table Rock project.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, August 10, 1935.

Hon. REUBEN T. WOOD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WOOD: I am in receipt of your recent verbal inquiry as to the status of the proposed Table Rock Dam on the White River, southwest of Branson, Mo.

I take pleasure in advising you that this Department has made a comprehensive survey of the White River under the provisions of House Document No. 308, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, in the combined interests of navigation, flood control, development of water power, and the needs of irrigation. The report on this survey was transmitted to Congress on March 30, 1932, and printed as House Document No. 102, Seventy-third Congress, first session. A copy of the report is enclosed for your information.

The survey of the White River has indicated that the construction of a dam at Table Rock, Mo., is feasible for the development of hydroelectric power. The dam considered for this site would be of the concrete gravity type with a height of 168 feet, a length of 1,740 feet, to provide a storage capacity of 1,200,000 acre-feet, and would be provided with a generator capacity of 81,000 kilowatts. The project would appear to be economically feasible for the development of hydroelectric power if and when a market for this power is developed. The report on this survey made no recommendations for improvement of the White River by the Federal Government. This Department received an application from the White River League for the inclusion of this project in the Emergency Relief Program. An analysis of the project indicated, however, that it could not be considered as eligible for inclusion in that program as the cost for the necessary rights-of-way and the type of work involved would make the cost per man-year for direct employment on the site considerably in excess of the cost established for the projects now being included in the relief program.

Very truly yours,

E. M. MARKHAM,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WOOD].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LORD: Page 3, line 10, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Headwater area of Susquehanna and Delaware Rivers and tributaries, and Onondaga Creek, New York State: Improvement of existing drainage ditches and the construction of new ditches, channel straightening, levees, cut-off canals, reservoirs for flood storage, island removal, or the construction of other flood-control works in accordance with the plan to be submitted by the office of the Chief of Engineers; cost, $8,500,000."

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, we have had a terrible flood in New York State that has done damage something like $27,000,000. While New York State will pay a greater portion than any other State of the cost of what we are voting in this bill, we believe we should have some consideration. We want to control the upper streams of the Delaware and Susquehanna Rivers and their tributaries. This small appropriation will help a little to control them and give us some recognition for what we will have to pay. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD].

The quesction was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FERGUSON) there were ayes 43 and noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Inasmuch as we are voting millions of dollars a minute, I should like to know whether it is in order to offer an amendment to build a dam around the United States Treasury to protect the taxpayers? [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDMISTON: On page 40, strike out lines 19, 20, 21, and 22.

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Chairman, this is an unusual amendment, as I am asking to strike out of the bill an appropriation of $626,000 [applause] for my district. I am in favor of this bill. There are good projects in this bill for the State of West Virginia, but this particular project is a bad project. The people living in this valley do not want this dam built, and we do not want it done. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. EDMISTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DITTER: On page 53, line 17, add a new paragraph, as follows:

"Schuylkill River, Pa., in Montgomery County, for flood control, $100,000."

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, those of the Membership of the House who have visited the historic shrine at Valley Forge will remember that the battlefields of Valley Forge abut on the Schuylkill River. During the past few months serious damage has been done not only to that historic shrine but to other contiguous lands. I offer this amendment in all seriousness. I believe it merits the support of every Member who believes that the old battlefield is worth preserving and protecting.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. Gladly.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The amendment makes no reference to any sort of report from the Corps of Engineers; neither is there any statement as to the cost and the benefits.

Mr. DITTER. I can answer the gentleman by saying that Colonel Lee, of the Army Engineers, has already examined and considered the justification of the project in question, and if other amendments which have been offered and supported here tonight warrant the expenditures authorized, the modest request which I make for Valley Forge demands the support of this House.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman vote for the bill if we put his amendment in?

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Colorado) there were—ayes 61 and noes 63.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MASSINGALE: On page 20, line 17, after the figures "$2,265,000", insert a new section as follows:

"Washita River in Oklahoma, flood control, reservoirs, and other incidental benefits; report to Congress not yet made; survey made and data in office of Chief of Engineers; $3,000,000."

Mr. MASSINGALE. This amendment is offered to take care of a mere matter of inadvertence. The Washita River has been surveyed, and three dams have been recommended. Every member of the Oklahoma delegation was in favor of the Washita River being included in this bill. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be adopted. If any river in the country is entitled to recognition for flood control, certainly the well-known flood history of the Washita puts it in the category of deserving attention along this line.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASSINGALE. I yield.

Mr. RICH. I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that with this $3,000,000 added to the $45,626,700 already in the bill, Oklahoma ought to be feathered pretty well.

Mr. MASSINGALE. That is good; I am glad the gentleman is so liberal; but none of the "feathering" goes to western or southern Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARLAN: Page 48, after end of line 23, add a new paragraph:

"To appropriate property and assume control of flood-prevention operations of the Miami Conservancy District of Ohio, $32,000,000."

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the shortness of the time, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by including therein a few paragraphs from a brief submitted by the city managers of Dayton, Middletown, and Hamilton.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. In 1913 we experienced a terrible flood in southwestern Ohio. As a result of that flood, a survey was made for flood-protection work, and we employed Dr. Arthur Morgan, who is now in charge of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I am sorry I cannot; I wish I could.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Is the gentleman for balancing the Budget?

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly; yes.

As a result of that work, the southwestern district of Ohio obligated itself on bonds to the value of $64,000,000 in flood-prevention work all in that district. The result is that the towns in that district are now expending as much for flood protection out of their own resources as they are for general expenses.

As a result of this tremendous charge upon the cities in this district their municipal functions are falling into neglect, their fire departments and police departments are being reduced, and it has become impossible for them to market their bonds sufficiently to get any material assistance from the Federal Government under the P. W. A. projects.

The people in my part of Ohio are so overburdened by this triple load of taxation that tax delinquencies are unprecedented, and in fact that section of Ohio is on the verge of a tax strike. If this occurs, which seems inevitable at this time, money for the support of flood-control work in this part of Ohio will not be forthcoming, and this great effort on the part of these people to save themselves and to help protect the lower Mississippi Valley will gradually sink into decay.

This conservancy district owns in the neighborhood of 12,000 acres of land, some of which is the most fertile land in the United States, and almost all of which is subject to profitable use by the Federal Government. There is an opportunity to use a great deal of this land for reforestation. There are five dams in this district which could be used to establish five lakes in a part of the country where there are practically no lakes. This will furnish conservation facilities for wildlife, it will assist in raising the subterranean water table, and will supply healthful places of entertainment for our people.

The Government in assuming all of this property for Federal purposes will be performing a valuable service to the lower Mississippi Valley because all of this water from the whole southwestern Ohio can be held back, thus minimizing the flood conditions farther down on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers.

These pioneering, hard-working, independent citizens have already paid $32,000,000 toward the cost and upkeep of this project. Almost every day they read in the papers where some other district in the United States has received P. W. A. development, and they are constantly reminded that they cannot get this type of work because their bonds cannot be sold. They read of the Government spending millions of dollars for flood control and they realize that they have never at any time received any help on this whole project, and they will be told that all over the United States new projects are being paid for out of the Federal Treasury with no local sacrifices called for whatsoever, and you cannot blame them for being resentful. I wish to say to this House right now that if this amendment is not adopted, and from the temper of this audience I rather anticipate that it may not be adopted, it is certainly my intention to vote against this whole bill.

Just the other day I received a communication from the city managers of Dayton, Hamilton, and Middletown, Ohio, setting forth their plaint, and I wish to include these remarks on this subject:

HAMILTON, OHIO, August 14, 1935.

Hon. BYRON B. HARLAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You will recall that during our conversation with Hon. Harry L. Hopkins, Works Division Administrator, it was suggested, and he requested, that we submit a transcript setting forth certain statements that were made at that hearing. He further suggested that a brief be submitted to you, and that you in turn would see that he received it.

Enclosed you will find a brief covering many of the high points brought out in our conversation.

We wish to thank you for your cooperation and your assistance in this matter.

Respectfully submitted.

R. P. PRICE,
City Manager, Hamilton, Ohio.
F. O. EICHELBAGER,
City Manager, Dayton, Ohio.
WALTER J. BRAUSE,
City Manager, Middletown, Ohio.

On Monday, July 1, 1935, a delegation of citizens and city officials, representing the municipalities in the Great Miami Valley, in what is known as the "Miami conservancy district", met in Washington with Colonel McIntyre, the executive secretary to the President, and filed with him a petition praying for relief from the excessive conservancy taxes and assessments.

At the close of the interview with Colonel McIntyre, he arranged for a conference with the Honorable Harry M. Hopkins, Works Relief Administrator, at which meeting this matter was further discussed, and Mr. Hopkins did not hesitate to offer his hearty cooperation in having the matter presented for a hearing before the administrative board, requesting also that the delegation submit a transcript setting forth the statements made verbally at this hearing.

The taxpayers of this district are confident that it would be just and proper that the Government take over the work being done by the Miami conservancy under the legislation entitled "The Miami Conservancy Act of Ohio", thus assuming the bonds and relieving the taxpayers in this district of further assessments.

They cite the fact that it is rare that assessments are levied against any particular community when other communities derive equal benefits, and that assessments are not made against communities for river, harbor, or levy protection. In this particular case the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers are affected by any flood condition created in the Great Miami Valley.

Up to the time of the disastrous flood of 1913, the Federal Government had not given serious consideration to flood prevention as a result of which the Miami Valley received no assistance from the Government. However, since that time similar catastrophes have taken place in other parts of the United States, in which the Government has not hesitated to appropriate large sums of money for this purpose, thereby relieving the various communities affected of any assessments for costs.

Briefly, the Miami conservancy district was formed by a special act of the legislature following the flood of 1913. Dams were built and the rivers walled to make a repetition of such a catastrophe an impossibility. To do this bonds were issued in the amount of $33,890,909.83. Benefit valuations were made against the entire district affected by the flood, in the total amount of $77,000,000—about twice the amount of the bond issues. Assessments have been made on a 50-percent basis of the total benefit valuation of $77,000,000 and are based on the benefits accruing from the protection. About half of the assessment is levied against the Government units as a whole and the remaining half is levied against the individual properties in the flood area. It is found that the major burden is borne by three counties in the following ratio:

	Percent
Montgomery	73
Butler	24
Miami	3

Warren and Hamilton Counties are assessed a very small amount.

The following table will show the total amounts that have been paid by each county to December 31, 1934, and also the 1934 payments:

County	Total payments	1934 payments
Montgomery	$26,131,512.82	$1,876,673.45
Butler	8,820,862.52	613,724.57
Miami	1,073,611.04	78,787.47
Warren	183,276.01	12,809.54
Hamilton	12,960.26	886.64

Below are figures showing the general situation December 31, 1934, of the conservancy district for such historical interest as it may contain:

Bonds retired	$10,953,919.30
Bonds outstanding	22,963,990.53
Original cost of project	29,712,991.38
Total bonds issued	33,890,909.83

Irregular serials mature 1922 to 1949; interest rate, 5½ percent.

Thus far, the taxpayers of the Great Miami Valley have paid approximately 50 percent of the conservancy assessment, and they would be only too willing to waive this if they can secure relief for the balance due, which covers approximately 15 more years, the life of the levy.

It should be borne in mind that this burden is carried alike by the manufacturer, the merchant, and the laborer, and just at this time is about all and really more than the man of moderate means can do to meet his building-association payments.

It is needless, therefore, to stress the importance of this movement in this section of the United States, from which is derived an enormous amount of Government taxes, with officials and civic organizations constantly confronted with this conservancy tax, which is at present taking more from the pockets of the taxpayers than any other individual tax collected, and thus hampering their efforts to aid counties and cities assume a retrenchment policy. For example, we will cite one city in the district—the city of Hamilton—taking 1934 as a comparison. The county tax rate was $2.53 per thousand. Of this amount, 56 cents was for conservancy, while the tax rate for the city of Hamilton was $8.05 per thousand, of which $3.81 was for conservancy, which, if deducted from the total, leaves $4.24 per thousand for general operations and bond retirement. Tax delinquencies for the same year amounted to $143,404.29 on a valuation of $63,898,225. The amount paid by the city of Hamilton to the conservancy district for the same period was $242,775.59. Added to this, of course, is the special assessment levied against those who were directly affected by the flood, making a total that the city of Hamilton pays into the conservancy sinking fund approximately $700,000 per year.

The taxes levied for conservancy purposes are of great importance to the citizens of the entire district. They are at the present time, and will be for a number of years, a major expense item, falling upon the counties as a whole, and particularly upon the citizens residing in the cities within the district. About one half of the taxes levied appear as a general tax on the counties and cities as units and the other half is a direct tax on each property affected.

If we had no conservancy tax in the cities of Dayton, Middletown, and Hamilton at the present time, we would have no financial problems, would have low tax rates, and would be in a position to pay for needed improvements, and could with more confidence and vigor invite new industries to locate in the district. As it is, it is quite a penalty to impose upon an industry contemplating establishment at Hamilton or Dayton, to have to pay almost as much for conservancy tax as for the total city operating tax.

For example, if some particular industry was to locate in the city of Hamilton, before the industry excavated a shovelful of earth or turned a wheel it would be penalized at the rate of $4.29 per thousand for every $1,000 invested in the construction of buildings and purchase of land, to say nothing of this particular land being located in the district affected by the flood, which would incur an additional special assessment.

By this you can see how the growth of the community is stagnated by virtue of excessive taxes for flood prevention. It is true that there has been a considerable reduction made in the valuation of properties in the valley, which has a tendency to lower the tax rate for operating and sinking-fund purposes as they affect the counties and cities themselves. This, however, is not true of the conservancy tax, for any reductions in the valuations of the properties only result in an increase in the rate per thousand in order to bring in the same amount of money necessary to retire bonds as they mature.

The conservancy district certified that for next year there should be collected from real estate in Hamilton, for the benefit of the district, $241,418.64, as the current assessment, and $163,672.39, as the accumulated delinquency. In fixing the tax rate for Hamilton, the budget commission made a levy for the current assessment but did not take action for the collection at the present time of the $163,672.39 which stands on the tax books against property owners who are delinquent in their tax payments.

These conditions further react against the intent of the Federal Housing Act, as those soliciting the citizens to take advantage of the opportunity to secure assistance in repairing, painting, and remodeling property through loans offered under this act are confronted with the fact that the owners are unable to secure the loans because of unpaid taxes, and most of these unpaid taxes are conservancy taxes.

This also has its effect upon communities in the district when effort is made to float bonds for improvement purposes, for all of the cities in this particular district have reached their limit in the issuance of bonds without a vote of the people, and are helpless to join with the Federal Government in taking advantage of opportunities to place people back to work.

After the disastrous Mississippi flood, Congress set up about a half-billion dollars for flood control on the Mississippi and its tributaries. Thus it appears that the only thing to be determined is whether the Great Miami is a tributary to the Mississippi. If so, we are entitled to our share of the flood-prevention fund. No section had a worse flood than we in 1913. The last information we had was that there was $338,000,000 left in the fund that was unappropriated. This is a matter worthy of careful consideration, and our organization will appreciate an investigation to determine the possibility and methods of turning the conservancy district over to the United States Government.

You are familiar with the fact that the Government is rendering considerable assistance at this time in the construction of the Muskingam Valley conservancy set-up. What part of this the Government is financing we are not in a position to state, but the citizens of the Great Miami Valley feel that they are entitled to equal consideration.

As suggested in your office, if the Federal Government purchased the reservoirs and lands of the Miami conservancy district for the purpose of reforestation, the proceeds could be used by the Miami conservancy district to place in the sinking fund for the retirement of the bonds as they matured.

Respectfully submitted.

R. P. PRICE,
City Manager City of Hamilton, Ohio.
WALTER J. BRAUN,
City Manager of Middletown, Ohio.
F. O. EICHELBERGER,
City Manager City of Dayton, Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and there were on a division (demanded by Mr. HARLAN)—ayes 20, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TURPIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TURPIN: Page 4, after line 13, add the following:

"Plymouth Borough, Pa.: Levee protection of people; plans in House Document No. 647, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session; cost, $560,000.

"Swoyersville and Forty Fort, Pa.: Levee protection of people; plans in House Document No. 647, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session; cost, $407,500.

"Exeter Borough, Pa.: Levee protection of people; plans in House Document No. 647, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session; cost, $180,500.

"Nanticoke Borough, Pa.: Levee protection of people; plans in House Document No. 647, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session; cost, $293,600.

"Kingston and Edwardsville, Pa.: Levee protection of people; plans in House Document No. 647, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session; cost, $1,275,500.

"Wilkes-Barre and Hanover Township, Pa.: Levee protection of people; plans in House Document No. 647, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session; cost, $1,638,000.

"West Pittston, Pa.: Levee protection of people; plans in House Document No. 647, Sixty-ninth Congress, second session; cost, $71,500."

Mr. TURPIN. Mr. Chairman, I have been particularly interested in flood control and regret I have but 2 minutes to present my reasons for this amendment. I have appeared before the Flood Control Committee time and time again. Last April I received from the Chairman of the Flood Control Committee the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 17, 1935.

Hon. C. MURRAY TURPIN, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN TURPIN: Reference is made to your several personal calls on me concerning your desire to secure ample allotment of funds for diking and dredging of the Susquehanna River in your congressional district. In order that the people of your district may be correctly informed as to just what has been done in this matter, I wish to state:

The Committee on Flood Control, of which I am chairman, and with which committee you have been cooperating on these matters, has reported to the Congress H. R. 6803, a copy of which I am attaching hereto. This bill allocates and makes available funds appropriated for public works for the relief of unemployment, $600,000,000 to be used in improvement works on all streams and rivers throughout the country where surveys and estimates have been completed by the Corps of Engineers of the Army and where a particular project has been found both economically and engineeringly justified. If the House of Representatives and the Senate concur in this proposal and same is approved by the President, the following work would be undertaken on the Susequehanna River in your section:

West Pittston	$71,500
Exeter	180,500
Swoyerville and Forty Fort	407,500
Plainsville	225,000
Wilkes-Barre and Hanover Township	1,638,000
Kingston and Edwardsville	1,275,000
Plymouth	560,000
Nanticoke	293,600
Total	4,651,600

I wish to again assure you that this committee appreciates your active interest and cooperation in these matters which are of such importance to the welfare of all sections of our country.

Yours very sincerely,

RILEY J. WILSON, Chairman.

Not one of the seven projects listed on the Susquehanna in this bill are on the north branch of the Susquehanna, where the flood conditions prevail, and not one of the projects listed in this bill pertaining to the Susquehanna has had a report from the Government engineers submitted to Congress, while the projects I offer as an amendment were reported to the Sixty-ninth Congress, Document 647.

In view of the promises made to me and the necessity of flood control in my district, I ask that my amendment receive favorable consideration.

The improvements contemplated on the Susquehanna in this bill are 115 miles below our flood area and are a waste of money so far as assistance to our Wyoming Valley is concerned. Our farmers alone lost over $600,000 due to floods this summer with accompanying property damage to others. The Army Engineers report 200,000 people living in this flood area and that under a combination of conditions to include heavy snow falls and a cold winter that would produce a thick covering of ice on the river—if this condition existed and should be followed by a simultaneous warm spell and continued rains, that a hundred million in property loss can be expected with accompanying terrific loss of life. My amendment is a most worthy one. I have been promised this consideration. I have been misled. I ask the adoption of this amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TURPIN) there were—ayes 44, noes 79.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FERGUSON. Has the half hour which was allotted to debate on this bill expired?

The CHAIRMAN. There are 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KNUTSON) there were—ayes 42, noes 75.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am very much interested and my curiosity is aroused as to just how rapidly the Chair may count.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE: Page 51, line 12, after the figures "$3,375,000" insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Cœur D'Alene River and south fork of Cœur D'Alene River, Idaho: Channel improvement and bank protection work to prevent erosion and flood damages. No report to Congress. Survey completed and data are in the Office of the Chief of Engineers; cost, $262,000."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time a proposal has been made to improve a river in the State of Idaho. We are only asking for the sum of $262,000 to protect the Coeur d'Alene Valley. In the wintertime the surrounding mountains are covered with snow from 6 to 10 feet deep, and when a chinook strikes that snow a tremendous flood occurs. In 1933, for example, the whole valley was swept by one of these terrible floods. Churches, hospitals, and other places were washed away. I went to a hospital that had one end washed away. Bridges were swept away, railroads and highways were washed out.

The War Department has finished their examination and they have made a report on this project. The amendment which I have just offered was taken from the records in the Chief of Engineer's office this afternoon, and it is at his request that this amendment is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Can the Chair advise the Members of the House how much has been added to this bill by way of amendments up to this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot advise the gentleman as to that matter.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOOD. At 8:45 p. m., the House agreed to a motion to close debate in 30 minutes. I am wondering just how far the clock has to go around to register 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GUYER: Page 49, line 14, insert a new paragraph after line 14:

"In Franklin, Miami, and Lynn Counties, Kans., for survey, levees, and clearing channel of Marais des Cygnes River; cost, $50,000."

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Chairman, this is a very small appropriation, requesting $50,000 to take care of one of the most puzzling streams in the United States, known as the Marais des Cygnes River. We request $50,000 to make another survey and locate reservoirs and to clear the channels.

Mr. Chairman, we are talking tonight about one of the most constructive and creative propositions that this Congress has undertaken this year. Many Members have acted this evening as if this were a circus, but may I say that what we do in reference to flood control will last longer than anything else we have done this year. [Applause.] It is constructive and creative, and I want to compliment the chairman of the committee as well as the Members who worked with him in framing this great legislation.

All of this flood prevention, soil conservation, and kindred enterprises are really worth while. We have surpluses now, but the time is coming when every inch of soil will be required to feed our population. The history of the human race has been that wherever a soil will support a huge population that population will in time to come, and unless the soil is conserved, there will be famine and desolation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLLISTER: I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is the second time a motion has been made to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary to discuss the point of order. The Committee has transacted business since the similar motion was made and the Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, we have had a very pleasant time and we can stay here all night having a pleasant time. I am sure we have put on a wonderful show for the galleries, but I believe in the interest of orderly legislation, in the interest of our own self-respect, in the interest of the self-respect of the House of Representatives, we ought to stop this show now and decide whether or not we are going to proceed in an orderly manner.

We have seen amendments involving $40,000,000 considered just as if they involved 5 cents. We have seen some amendments passed and we have seen some amendments killed with, apparently, no particular rime or reason.

I am merely submitting the motion to the membership that in the interest of common decency and in the interest of their own self-respect, they stop this show now and report the bill back as I have suggested. [Applause.]

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, there has been a deliberate attempt on the part of some of the Members of the House to make this thing a sideshow. Some of you have succeeded. I want to say to you that this is meritorious legislation which is entitled to the consideration of this House. [Applause.]

As I have said, the attempt was first started, deliberately, to load the bill. You failed in that. There has been amendment after amendment offered to this bill, and the amendments have been consistently voted down by the House. There have been seven amendments adopted and three of the amendments were to take money out of the bill which amounted to approximately as much as the money that was put into the bill by the amendments that were adopted.

I call on the common sense of the membership of this House, in the name of common decency, let us keep the House of Representatives decent and consider this bill in a legislative and a deliberative and a gentlemanly manner. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOLLISTER) there were—ayes 60, noes 92.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOPE: Page 13, line 12, after the figures "$1,050,000", strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following: "Provided, That the Chief of Army Engineers be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to substitute reservoirs in the Cow Creek drainage area to give the same flood protection, if the cost thereof is justified."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further amendments, the Committee rises under the rule.

Accordingly, the Committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. FULLER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8455) authorizing the construction of certain public works on rivers and harbors for flood control, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 349, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in Committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, on the final passage of the bill, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 141, not voting 136, as follows:

PRESIDENT'S BIRTHDAY BALL

Mr. UTTERBACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEARIN].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UTTERBACK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. OTHA D. WEARIN at Charles Town, W. Va., on Wednesday, January 30:

It seems peculiarly fitting and proper that my first public address in this section of the East, outside of the city of Washington, should be in West Virginia, the ancestral home of my family, from whence, many long years ago, my great-grandfather, Michel Wearin, and his four sons started their westward migration that led them into Ohio, Indiana, and eventually to the valley of the Nishna in the Hawkeye State beyond the Father of Waters.

Tonight I return to the scenes of my forefathers with a feeling that somehow I sort of belong here in this lovely, historic, western portion of the Old Dominion. To those of you who might have been our neighbors, I bring greetings from those of us who have wandered far beyond the blue to lend a helping hand in carving empires from seas of waving prairie grass. I assure you it was the ever-present, indescribable, but cheering bond of security in the homeland here in this Commonwealth east of the Alleghenies that made possible whatever meager success we may have achieved. Our thoughts turn back to you, times beyond number.

I am with you this evening by the courtesy of your distinguished and able Representative in Congress, the Honorable JENNINGS RANDOLPH, who I assure you has become a prominent Member in the halls of your national legislative body. It is our good fortune, both of us, to be members of the younger group of men who are serving in the House of Representatives at the present time. Sir William Pitt, who as a Member of Parliament at 21, Chancellor of the Exchequer at 23, Prime Minister and practically ruler of all England at 25, used to say half whimsically that he was "guilty of the damnable crime of being a young man." We note with interest, however, that throughout the history of civilized society men under 40 have marched in the vanguard of public affairs, in many instances rendering a tremendous service to the cause of their country.

The Declaration of Independence in our own beloved Nation was written by a man who was still in his thirties, as was his contemporary who practically planned and organized our National Treasury system. Upon certain occasions I devote a full evening to the discussion of marked contributions on the part of the world's youth, not the least of whom was William Cullen Bryant, who at 16 wrote one of the greatest poems of all time, "Thanatopsis." It is sufficient to say that this State of West Virginia, as has your sister of whom you were at one time part and parcel, the Old Dominion, seen fit to continue recognizing youth.

It seems only fitting and proper at this milestone of our national progress that we pause for a moment to consider that ever-present challenge, "Whither bound?" In the early days of American democracy there were but few economic rocks ahead for those who ruled this infant Nation. What seemed unlimited acres of rich and fertile soil stretched out beyond the Alleghenies to a far-flung golden coast line that was little more than a mythical dream. When society became oppressive or when opportunities at home were for one reason or another curtailed, the individual was at liberty to expand, to take to the open road, to establish a new home in a territory that he might reclaim for his own. Macaulay once said, in effect, that our Nation would be safe under the rule of democracy until we had claimed our land, harnessed our rivers, and linked our shores with transportation.

I would remind you likewise that in this society it was of paramount importance—in fact, it was a necessity—that we utilize the foreign markets of our neighbors. The products of England, of France, and of the Orient were brought into the coastal harbors of the Atlantic, up the Potomac, the Chesapeake, and the other great rivers of the East that penetrate beyond the outermost edges of the tidewater area. In return we shipped back in the empty holds of the then scarcely adequate merchant marine the riches of our tobacco, cotton, furs, grains, and other valuable articles of trade. In other words, a normal trade condition existed. We bought and we sold, thereby creating margins of profit abroad and at home. Under this program of settlement, of expansion, and of trade America prospered and became rich. She passed through intermittent decades of rising and falling markets occasioned by various circumstances, among which was the increasing tendency of what at one time was known as "the Federalist group", now better termed, perhaps, "the Nationalist", and to be found in both major political parties today, who were advocating and securing higher levels of tariff protection upon the theory that the policy would safeguard our workmen's standard of living and enrich the coffers of infant industries.

Wars were fought, discoveries were made, alterations of government were effected, and still America lived. As a result of those circumstances the balance of trade was largely in the hands of our neighbors across the sea, and things were faring quite well in this new democratic land of ours.

At about this juncture in affairs an incident of great importance and significance—in fact, the turning point in the economic history of America occurred. War was declared on the Continent of Europe, ostensibly because of murdered royalty in the little country of Serbia, but in reality because of long-smoldering hatreds and ambitious dreams on the part of military groups that dominated not only monarchs but the deliberative assemblies of their respective countries. Eventually America was catapulted into the conflict, but even before that incident occurred her position in the international set-up underwent a distinct alteration. She found to her satisfaction and delight that she was selling more than she was buying. The demand for American-made goods on the part of nations devoting their full strength to the operation of war machines was tremendous.

American munitions manufacturers were in glory. Production of all types in industrial circles was stimulated, even farm prices began to rise, and America thought she was entering upon a period of industrial expansion that would continue indefinitely. Eventually our own forces were drawn out upon the bloody fields of battle, at which time the production of this Nation was driven to the last inch. Every available pound of steam was pushed into American boilers; every wheel whirred in its endless round of haste. Our Nation was like a great liner being pushed to the last knot in a record run, and, fortunately, we made it; but at the conclusion of hostilities we found ourselves in a state of affairs that taxed the knowledge of our diplomats and financiers. Our position was exactly the reverse of what it was before the opening days of the World War. In place of being in debt, every major civilized nation on the globe owed us money. The principles of an inescapable economic law suddenly dawned upon the consciousness of those who ruled the Nation in Washington and the temples of the money changers.

There are only three satisfactory ways in which man or country can do business. Those three methods are cash, credit, and exchange. Keeping those facts in mind let us analyze briefly the circumstances under which this country was operating. A new party had come into power in Washington pledged to an extreme nationalistic policy, to be promoted through the agency of an excessively high protective tariff which was enacted in the early years of its reign ere the stench had scarcely cleared from the battlefields of Europe and long before the smoking guns of the respective armies had been trundled from the scene of action. America had been urged to produce to capacity and was still doing so under the theory that she could preserve her prosperous era thereby, but obviously her output was greater than her capacity to consume and, therefore, she must find a market for her surplus in order to keep the wheels of her factories turning, the plows of her farmers scouring, and the hands of her workmen employed. But what was the situation with reference to that market?

The nations of Europe had borrowed to the hilt in their supreme effort to win the war, consequently their security as far as the international bankers of America were concerned was not good and, therefore, the possibility of doing business with Europe on the basis of credit was impossible.

Not only had foreign nations exhausted their credit but they had spent practically every available dollar of cash, as was evidenced by the fact that the United States had in its possession at that time 60 percent of the world's gold supply. It takes the balance of that commodity to operate satisfactorily the business of the universe, other than in America. So we can see very plainly that the possibility of doing business for cash with America in order to absorb her surplus was impossible. The only remaining method available was by exchange of goods for goods, but the American tariff system at that time was so excessively high that no such arrangement was possible.

We maintained ourselves for a few short months in order to get by a congressional election through the illicit and unfortunate practice of permitting our foreign neighbors to sell millions of dollars in worthless bonds to the unsuspecting American public that the international bankers of this country would not buy themselves. Thus, as far as the common man was concerned insult was added to injury. It was evident to all those who were careful observers at the time that a catastrophe was inevitable, and it came from not being able to sell our surplus that we were producing at top speed in an effort to supply American labor with employment, that was piling higher and higher in the granaries and storehouses of the Nation. When American industries began to realize the situation they gradually started decreasing operations with the result that we soon had the peculiar phenomena of vast riches, tremendous supplies of food, clothing, and supplies on hand while men lost their jobs by the tens of thousands and, thereby, their purchasing power.

In the face of these facts that I have endeavored to explain to you in the order of their occurrence there are still those in America who would have you believe that an excessively high protective-tariff system preserves the standard of American laboring men, when, under the highest tariff of American history, 12,000,000 to 15,000,000 of them marched the streets and the country roads of America hungry and unemployed. European markets were closed to us because they had exhausted their financial resources in the war as well as their credit and the leadership of this Nation, like an overfull vulture, sat back in complacence and refused to do business upon any reasonable basis of exchange.

It was this situation which confronted our able and distinguished Franklin D. Roosevelt in March 1933, only it had grown to the point of a great national calamity. The closing of industries had affected the purchasing power of American labor, thus leaving the farmers of the Nation without a market, resulting in corn that sold in my country for 8 cents a bushel, less than the tariff on that product, wheat that sold in Kansas for approximately half the tariff on the product.

Agricultural producers therefore were unable to meet their obligations, resulting in the closing of banks by the thousands. There was little the new administration could do at its advent in Washington other than to temporarily endeavor to curtail agricultural and industrial production, unsound as the theory involved therein is, until such time as the financial condition of the Nation in general could be temporarily bolstered.

Unfortunately, while we are attending to the flames at our threshold, the prairies beyond the dooryard are on fire. In the curtailing of production, while we are endeavoring to negotiate trade treaties, which is the only available means of correcting the unfortunate situation perpetrated upon the American people, the markets that should have been America's ever since the armistice are being rapidly absorbed through nationalistic programs on the part of other countries who are being stimulated to feed and clothe themselves. It is to be hoped that this unfortunate condition through which America has passed can be corrected and that we can pull out of the trough in which we have been swamped.

I hope that we will be able to see the return of a healthy condition in American business occasioned by the normal trade of this Nation with the far corners of the earth in order that our surpluses of agriculture and manufactured products, totaling in many individual cases as much as 60, 70, or 80 percent, can be marketed. Only through such a program can we preserve individual liberty and a degree of prosperity in the United States. Only in that manner can we keep the wheels of industry moving, continue men at work, and create a prosperous agriculture. To follow a nationalistic program of control and regulation to its ultimate conclusion would, of course, be out of harmony with the Jeffersonian theory of personal liberty of a type that does not endanger the welfare of others. Nationalism of the type that was being stimulated under the provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act would lead, of course, to the enthronement of liberty in robes of personal greed that would eventually have swished aside the welfare of the masses. Certainly we do not desire that type of economic policy in America nor do we anticipate nationalistic control that will lead us to state ownership in other than a few fields that have become so universally indispensable to the public welfare. In other words, generally speaking, I believe that America still prefers poker to contract bridge.

To my mind, if the intelligent young men and women of America can pioneer their way as they always have done toward the goal of sensible economic relationships on the part of this Nation with all nations, if we can achieve a sound trade basis under which American labor can be kept employed in our factories, thereby supplying the necessary purchasing power to create prosperity in American agriculture, we will be on our way to a permanent status of sound business that will again speak well for the financial independence of the average American citizen. In doing this we will in the words of that noted poet whose name has already entered into my remarks tonight:

> Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
> As the swift seasons roll!
> Leave thy low-vaulted past!
> Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
> Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
> 'Till thou at length art free,
> Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea!

DEAR MR. WITHROW: We are disturbed lest Congress may fail to enact the necessary neutrality legislation this session and thereby the United States may be drawn into the next foreign war.

Will you do your utmost to secure the immediate enactment of a comprehensive neutrality policy that will prevent the United States from being drawn into a foreign war? So that our feelings may be known to other Senators, please place our expression of opinion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

THE HOMESTEAD NATIONAL MONUMENT OF AMERICA, THE LINK BETWEEN THE HOMESTEAD ACT OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN AND THE RECOVERY PROGRAM OF FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT. (1863–1935)

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks, I present a brief statement in support of the proposed establishment of the Homestead National Monument of America in Gage County, Nebr.

The citizens of Beatrice for the past 30 years have been making an effort to convert the Daniel Freeman Homestead No. 1 into a national park. The interest now has not only spread throughout the State of Nebraska, but has gone beyond its boundaries into other States.

The Freeman homestead is located 5 miles northwest of Beatrice. It contains 160 acres of fertile soil. It is a typical midwestern tract of land in the shape of a T. Its surface varies from slightly rolling to level areas. Through the center of it a small stream winds its way, which is fed by constant-flowing springs. The banks of the stream are carpeted with a heavy growth of blue grass, shaded by stately trees of several varieties.

The old freighting road from the Missouri River to the mountains runs for nearly a mile through the homestead, and on the hill at one corner of the farm overlooking the valley and the freighting road are the graves of Mr. and Mrs. Freeman. A short distance below is a marker made of the stone taken from the old Nebraska State Capitol and erected by the D. A. R. of Nebraska.

The Daniel Freeman homestead marks the most important act for the welfare of the people ever passed in the history of the United States. For the first 80 years of the United States history there were no free homesteads. All those who wanted land had to purchase it. While it was priced low, the people in many cases were too poor to buy it even at a low cost. In 1852 a party called the "Free Soil Party" demanded homesteads for the people. In 1854 the first free-homestead bill was introduced in Congress by Congressman Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania. The act required the settler to pay 25 cents an acre for the land, and it was passed in 1860 but vetoed by President Buchanan. Two years later the bill was introduced again in a slightly different form and on May 20, 1862, the Free Homestead Act was finally passed and signed by President Abraham Lincoln. The law was effective January 1, 1863.

The Homestead Act is sometimes conceived as a plan which originated in the Middle West. However, its inception was embodied in the desire to relieve the conditions in the East. There were many unemployed then—as there are now. The Homestead Act was in one respect a reward to the soldiers of the Union Army. It gave every citizen a right to make a home upon the public domain. Thus, the middle western territory was the solution to the problem of the East.

The first free homestead in the United States was taken by Daniel Freeman on Cub Creek in Gage County, Nebr. When the free-homestead bill was signed, Daniel Freeman was a soldier in the Union Army. Shortly after, while on a furlough, he selected his tract of land and started for the nearest land office, which was at Brownville, Nebr. He arrived there on December 31, 1862. The little village was thronged with settlers who came there for the same purpose. The land seekers enjoyed themselves that evening at a New Year's party. Since the next day was New Year's Day, the land office was closed. Mr. Freeman had orders to leave on the 1st of January to join his regiment. It was known how anxious Daniel Freeman was to be the first to file for a homestead, so by general consent, at midnight, the clerk of the land office opened it for a few minutes and made it possible for Daniel Freeman to sign for the first homestead in the United States.

Daniel Freeman served his country in the Union Army until the close of the Civil War in 1865. He then brought his bride and settled on his Nebraska homestead, which symbolizes the home building and the settlement of the Middle West.

Some 1,000,000 homesteaders followed Mr. Freeman, receiving about 120,000,000 acres of land as a free gift from our Government. There were other grants of land which were made to promote the growth of this section. Nebraska alone received 3,370,000 acres. Sections 16 and 36 of each township were appropriated for the public school, 90,000 acres were appropriated for the agricultural college, 46,080 acres for the university. The remainder was to be used for internal improvements. Other grants were made to railroad companies to encourage railroad construction.

As the Middle West was settled it was found that in sandhill areas 160 acres was not sufficient to support a family, so in 1904, through the efforts of Congressman Moses P. Kinkaid, of Nebraska, another homestead act was passed which increased the area from 160 acres to 640 acres. Some 8,000,000 acres of sandy and rough land was settled by virtue of this act. Today it is being found that many of these areas cannot support families even on this enlarged basis, so the Government is buying back this land and is turning it into wild-game reserves, national parks, and forest reserves similar to the Halsey Reserve and the Niobrara Reserve in Cherry County, Nebr.

The Homestead Act, enacted for the purpose of solving a problem of humanity, marks a certain era in our civilization. The need then was chiefly material. Today humanity again is at the crossroads. The need now is partly material, but also spiritual. It is contended by many that since the Homestead Act marks this most significant development of the Middle West, its importance should be signified by making homestead no. 1 into a national monument.

Does it not seem fitting that since homestead no. 1 marks the old era in the Government's effort to solve the problems of humanity, this same Government should use this same homestead no. 1 and make it a national park? It should be conceived as a monument to the pioneers of the new day who must view the needs of humanity, not only in satisfying material wants, but also in satisfying those intangible spiritual needs which are necessary for full, rich living and a complete life—the goal of our democracy.

This is the story of the part the homestead idea played in the life of our civilization. The importance of perpetuating the knowledge of its significance is so keenly felt and appreciated by such organizations as the Congress of Parents and Teachers, the D. A. R., the American Legion, and many other citizens that a request is being made to convert, by an act of Congress, homestead no. 1 into a national park.

WAR DEPARTMENT INVESTIGATION

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, under general permission, I insert the following, which are my own remarks relative to the War Department investigation, prepared primarily as a press release:

Chairman McSWAIN of the Committee on Military Affairs this day filed his report upon the proceedings of that committee in its investigation of War Department transactions by authority of House Resolution 59. This is a very voluminous report and covers a wide range of subjects. It calls attention to the fact that the committee has been exceedingly busy during this entire session with its investigation. It has examined about 90 witnesses and taken about 3,000 pages of typewritten testimony, and has examined hundreds of files and thousands of letters from the War Department and from those firms and individuals who have had business transactions with the War Department. The report briefly recapitulates the cases relating to Maj. Gen. Benjamin D. Foulois, Brig. Gen. Alexander E. Williams, and Col. Joseph I. McMullen, and directs attention to the fact that every substantial allegation of fact that has been made by the committee with regard to these officers has been sustained.

A large part of the report deals with the transactions of Joseph Silverman, operating under a number of different firm names, with the War Department since the year 1919. It describes the methods and tactics employed by Silverman in seeking by influence and favors to obtain action upon his proposals to buy War Department surplus goods. It points out the fact that the terrible abuses that have grown up in connection with these transactions, with which the name of Silverman is connected, were due to the existence of a statute permitting the sale of surplus Army goods by negotiated contracts. This act of Congress, passed in 1919, should be repealed, and a bill has been introduced by Chairman McSWAIN to repeal that statute and to require that all such surplus Army goods shall be advertised and all persons shall have an equal right to bid, and the property shall be sold to the highest bidder. The War Department has approved of this bill, and undoubtedly it will be enacted into law early in the next session of Congress.

The report also deals with the practices that have heretofore prevailed with reference to the purchase of Army aircraft and Army motor vehicles. It points to the fact that the act of July 2, 1926, with reference to the procurement of aircraft, has not been obeyed in either letter or spirit, and that the Judge Advocate General of the Army, the Attorney General of the United States, and the Comptroller General of the United States have all held that the views of the committee as to the proper construction of the act of July 2, 1926, are correct.

The report quotes letters from the Secretary of War and the Assistant Secretary of War to the effect that the practice heretofore prevailing of purchasing aircraft by negotiated bids has been abandoned and that, beginning about a year ago, design competitions have been opened and manufacturers have been invited to submit new designs of aircraft, and that as a result of this new procedure great progress has been made. It is believed that the progress of military aviation during the last year, as a result of this lively competition between the several manufacturers, has advanced as much as 5 years over conditions heretofore prevailing. As a result of this new principle of competition we now have at Wright Field, being tested and evaluated, three bombers which are believed to be in advance of anything else of the kind in the world. They are the Martin bomber, the Douglass bomber, and the Boeing bomber. The latter bomber very recently made a nonstop flight from the factory where it was built in Seattle, Wash., to Dayton, Ohio, of 2,100 miles in 11 hours and used only 65 percent of its power. Progress in the building of bombers by competition is duplicated also as to pursuit planes and observation planes. Speed has been tremendously accelerated in the last year, and the Committee on Military Affairs believes that the new policy of the War Department will not only put America ahead of other nations in the performance of its aircraft but will keep America ahead if the principle of competition in design and performance is kept up in the right spirit.

The report of the committee also deals extensively with the practice heretofore prevailing with reference to the purchase of motor vehicles such as truck and passenger automobiles. It points out that favoritism and partiality have been shown by reason of peculiar and unnecessary specifications whereby all manufacturers except one would be excluded from bidding. An illustration is the fact that full-force lubrication was prescribed in the early part of 1934 as against the ordinary splash system of lubrication. By reason of these specifications the Chevrolet trucks were excluded from bidding for War Department business. The committee recommends that henceforth when automobiles in large quantity are to be bought that representatives of the War Department and of the several services requiring such automobiles meet in conference with representatives of the various automobile manufacturers and that they then confer as to the absolute requirements of performance necessary to meet the demands of the service. Then such broad and comprehensive specifications will be written as to permit actual bona fide competition between the several manufacturers of automobiles. By reason of this competition the Government will not only get trucks at a lower price but will undoubtedly in the end obtain better trucks and better automobiles.

The report of the committee also goes somewhat extensively into the subject of an alleged conspiracy sought to be entered into between Joseph Silverman, Frank Speicher, and representatives of certain manufacturers of automobiles whereby all bids for automobiles would be pooled and the pooling agent was to be Joseph Silverman, and the testimony tends to show that Joseph Silverman was to obtain a commission of about $750,000 on the purchase of $10,000,000 worth of automobiles and trucks. This $750,000 was to be split three ways, according to some testimony, one-third to Silverman, one-third to Frank Speicher, and one-third to Norman K. Haig. Of course, there is some testimony that certain underlings, tools of these principal actors, were to receive financial rewards. Such testimony quotes Joseph Silverman to the effect that "he had a horse to feed, whereas others had only rabbits to feed." The text of the testimony would indicate that by a "horse" it was intended to refer to some very expensive and costly individual of great influence that Silverman claimed to control. By "rabbits" it manifestly meant persons of less influence who would receive less reward.

The report also indicates by 15 different questions lines of inquiry and investigation which the committee has been unable to complete. As to the matters covered by those questions, no testimony is included in the report, because the committee states that it has been very scrupulous to follow the policy announced by Chairman McSWAIN at the time House Resolution 59 was adopted by the House, that the reputation of no man would be besmirched by insinuations, and that facts and only facts would be adduced. Chairman McSWAIN stated that it was not the purpose of the committee to go headline hunting or to seek sensations. The committee congratulates, through the chairman, the War Department and the Congress and the whole country that so few Army officers have been found to be guilty of dereliction of duty and wrongdoing. It directs attention to the fact that of 12,000 Army officers, a very small number, certainly less than a dozen in all, have been found to be connected with questionable practices; and the names of all such are excluded from the public, except those already mentioned in this statement, because the committee is unwilling to blast the reputation of any officer until abundant evidence is in possession of the committee that his own conduct justifies condemnation.

On the contrary, the thousands of high-minded, honorable, honest, patriotic, and efficient officers are commended for their service to the country and their efforts constantly to improve their efficiency in order to be of greater service in the event of a national emergency. Chairman McSWAIN says that the investigation has already resulted in saving to the Government millions of dollars and has purged the condition that had heretofore created a great deal of suspicion, and that he believes the investigation will in the future result in the saving of tens of millions of dollars. Furthermore, the housecleaning by this investigation will have a beneficial and cleansing effect for a long time, perhaps a hundred years. The memory of the shame and disgrace of those who were caught red-handed will constantly be before all others who may be tempted and the temptation will consequently be resisted. Therefore, Chairman McSWAIN says that the investigation has strengthened the cause of national defense tremendously. It has cleared the atmosphere, which has been murky with suspicion and rumors for several years. The investigation has been very thorough, and if, from now on, anybody suggests suspicion, the complete answer is that the committee worked very hard, spared no man, however high or however low, went to the bottom of all records, searched the files of every person having had business with the War Department, and that if there was anything wrong the committee would have found it.

The public will remember that one of the results of the investigation was the exposure of an unbusinesslike condition at the Port Newark Army supply base at Newark, N. J. It was discovered, after nearly 3 years of diligent investigation by the committee, that the Mercur Corporation, which was operating said supply base, which in fact was a very large warehouse or series of warehouses, was in default in its payments to the Government of approximately $800,000. As a result of that investigation a suit for accounting was ordered to be instituted and has been instituted several months ago in the southern district of New York, and the same is now pending. The Department of Justice is vigorously prosecuting that suit and undoubtedly a substantial recovery will be had. Many other matters are referred to briefly in the report, and as the investigation will continue during the recess and also during the next session of Congress as additional irregularities may be discovered, the public will be apprised of them through partial reports from time to time and through press releases, but no innocent man will be besmirched and yet no powerful person will be protected if in the wrong. The committee is out to get the facts and nothing but the facts, and will not be deterred in its determination to ascertain the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

NEUTRALITY

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, in spite of the justification to bring the present session of Congress to a close as speedily as possible, I am persuaded that the serious situation in Europe today demands our attention in the hope of avoiding a recurrence of the conditions which grew out of the Serbian episode of 1914, and which ultimately forced America into the World War. News dispatches touching upon the Italian-Ethiopian relations paint a gloomy and foreboding picture.

Europe is again at the brink of an abyss. The peace of Europe is again threatened. The stage seems set for a struggle similar to the conflagration which burned away billions of dollars only a few short years ago. The war to end wars was apparently a dismal failure in the march of humanity for progress and toward peace. The seriousness of the situation is made plain as we read of the special meeting of the British Cabinet today to study the gravity of the conditions prevailing in Europe. I am not an alarmist. Scare headlines do not affect me, but no one, who has given any attention to the subject, can be insensible of the imminence of the danger. And, Mr. Speaker, it is my conviction that we have a duty to perform, a duty to every American boy, to every American mother, to every American home to do everything in our power before we adjourn to prevent this Nation from being drawn again into the vortex of devastation and destruction. And, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to remain in session until such reasonable measures are enacted as will still the fears and quiet the heart throbs of the mothers of the land who remember only too well the anguish of the bugle call, the drum beat, and the rattle of musketry. The certainty of the neutrality of America should be established. The imminence of the danger brooks no delay.

A detailed recital of the influences which brought our Nation into the World War are hardly necessary. Suffice it to say that indisputable evidence has been presented which proves conclusively that dealing in munitions and the financial factors incident thereto played a most prominent part in plunging us into the struggle. An examination of a letter from Secretary of State Lansing dated September 6, 1915, to President Wilson is illuminating as it portrays conditions and discloses the true picture of events which culminated in our declaration of war. A neutrality policy had been adopted by the country. The warring nations of Europe were increasingly dependent upon us for goods and munitions. Our exports exceeded our imports and large credit balances in our favor were established. The financial strain upon the European nations and the European bankers as a result of the increasing indebtedness indicated either a discontinuance of purchases here in America by the belligerents or a collapse of their financial structure. The Secretary of State, in pointing out what seemed to him to be the dire consequences of a discontinuance of our munitions trade, based his appeal for a change in our neutrality policy on the threatened diminution of industry and the loss of our business interests. The letter advocated a change in policy which would permit loans being floated here to enable the belligerent nations to continue to meet their obligations for the purchase of more devices for carnage and destruction.

Mr. Speaker, one line of that letter warrants exact repetition as the Secretary says:

My opinion is that we ought to allow the loans to be made for our own good.

The hellish harrows of that conflict, the memories of 1917 and 1918 rise up to haunt us as we read the words "our own good." Our own good meant putting dollars above the instrumentalities that give us love and affection and home ties and precipitated our Nation into the fiendish fury. The Secretary's plea was effective. Price was put above peace. Loans were floated. Munitions were manufactured. Neutrality became a farce. The success of debtor nations was threatened. Propagandists played their part. And America was in the World War. "Make the world safe for democracy" was the deceptive phrase used to entice the flower of American manhood to the fields of France, to make business safe for those who dealt in devices for the destruction of civilization. Parenthetically it should be said, the phrase "war debts" is still a haunting memory.

A possible repetition of such conditions should not be countenanced today. Upon us falls the solemn obligation to keep America safe for peace, to prevent the sacrifice of American manhood on the altar of commercial expediency, and to contribute our influence as a people to world peace. I have supported and shall continue to support a program for the adequate defense of the Nation. I am convinced that the surest path for the peace of America lies in the maintenance of an Army and Navy which will command the respect of the nations of the world. But this program does not include a policy of meddling through business interests in the affairs of Europe.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore urge the adoption of the Senate resolution on neutrality. It provides the most feasible protection against the dangers which we face. It places a premium on peace and places manhood above munitions. I believe that it will minimize the possibility of America's being drawn into the threatened European destruction and that it will make America safe for the survival of the spirit of peace and good will.

KRAMER BILL TWIN-KILLER OF AMERICAN LIBERTY WITH THE NAVAL-MILITARY GAG BILL

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, the Kramer bill has been reported out of the Judiciary Committee. I was really astonished when the bill was reported out. I regard the Kramer bill and the "military disaffection bill" as the two most dangerous bills ever to get near the floor since the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798. They are twin bills to kill American liberty and freedom. I am glad to note that Hon. EMANUEL CELLER, of New York, has filed a brilliant minority report opposing the Kramer bill. Mr. CELLER's report is a document worth reading. He cites many cases which are interesting, and should be studied. I am informed several other Members will vigorously oppose it.

Personally I do not think that the depression is by any means over—I am afraid the worst is yet to come. I think that we face much more serious problems than we can now possibly realize. And as an American—or as a human being—hating and despising brutality, despotic government, race prejudice, poverty, hunger, starvation, and the violation of ordinary human rights, I favor settling our problems in a peaceful manner and with the ballot.

Insofar as we understand government, brute force is not a proper agency to control men's minds and their ideas.

Force begets force. Hatred begets hatred. And if we start jailing people for talk and for writing, however irresponsible or wild these utterances may be, we are leading ourselves into trouble, and we already have dozens of laws to protect this Government against criminal and overt acts; this Kramer bill is absolutely unnecessary. The worst thing about these antisedition bills is that they will be misused against innocent people for the suppression of opinions, the prevention of freedom of press, will be an instrument of widest oppression, will cause fanatical actions throughout the country, and will serve no purpose except to cause trouble, disturbance, and ill feeling. It is another Stalin-Hitler bill that thoroughly deserves an overwhelming defeat.

I heretofore indicated and have inserted in the RECORD the attitude of the press against the naval-military gag bill and I have found that literally thousands of editorials and stories have been written against that bill—and the Kramer bill is getting the same reception. It would be impossible to even enumerate the editorials and stories, but I take pleasure in inserting in the RECORD an editorial from the State of Virginia, which is undoubtedly the most conservative State in the Union. It is from the Richmond Times-Dispatch of Wednesday, August 21, 1935, and is as follows:

ANOTHER THREAT TO LIBERTY

At the risk of becoming tedious, the Times-Dispatch warns against another threat to civil liberties—the Kramer bill, now pending in Congress. Like the iniquitous Tydings-McCormack antisedition bill, this measure embodies great potentialities for evil, and is unnecessary besides. The bill makes it a felony to advocate the overthrow of the United States Government by force and violence. There are strict laws on the books now against insurrection or conspiracy, and the only utterances now immune are individual utterances and writings. If the constitutional guarantee of free speech and a free press means anything, they must remain immune.

No one can say where the thing would end if the Kramer bill were passed. Advocated by such professional patrioteers as the Hearst and Macfadden newspapers, this gag law might be used in many ways, once it was on the statute books. It could be invoked against publishers of newspapers or books who might be deemed to have published something construable as advocacy of violent overthrow of the Government. It might be used to deny organized labor its constitutional rights.

We are frankly suspicious of any legislation of this nature sponsored by the Hearst newspapers. The despicable and dishonest "red hunts" in which those sheets have indulged of late are enough to disgust any honest citizen.

This country has gotten along pretty well for considerably more than a century without the enactment of a peace-time seditional law, and there is no reason to believe that we need one now. The sedition law of 1798 is the last such piece of legislation with which we have been afflicted, and we trust there won't be any more like it.

The Kramer bill is a companion measure to the Tydings-McCormack bill. It is designed to protect the civilian population from the "red menace", whatever that is, just as the Tydings-McCormack bill is aimed at saving the Army and Navy from the bold, bad Bolsheviki. The sooner both bills go down the chute the better.

THE FALLACY OF THE PRESIDENT'S EMPLOYMENT POLICY

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the morale and spirit of thousands of honest unemployed in this country is being crushed and destroyed by the labor policy of the President in connection with the huge spending program of the present administration. The President's Executive order which requires that 90 percent of labor on Government projects must be taken from relief rolls is an insult to the hundreds of thousands of unemployed who have had the courage, pride, and fortitude to in some way take care of themselves and stay off of the Governmental relief rolls.

Hundreds of letters, telegrams, and resolutions of protest against the President's labor policy have come to me from individuals, labor organizations, service and business clubs. These communications have come particularly from my own congressional district in southeastern Minnesota. In the cities of Winona, Kellogg, Wabasha, Lake City, Red Wing, and other communities in the district thousands of unemployed, not on relief, are walking the streets of their respective communities.

Work is available for thousands of laborers in connection with the construction of dams in the upper Mississippi River. The unemployed not on relief have asked to be put to work on these projects, but Mr. Harry Hopkins and the President turn deaf ears to their appeals and say, "You cannot have work because you are not on relief." The number of employable persons on relief are few, and instead of using other local unemployed the administration is importing labor from long distances to take away the work which rightfully belongs to local labor.

I have discussed this matter with Mr. Hopkins and his associates. They will do nothing. On August 9 of this year I addressed a letter to the President, requesting him to change his labor policy, but up to date he has utterly ignored my request and the appeals of thousands of unemployed in my district.

For the benefit of the Members of the House, I am inserting herewith my letter to the President.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 9, 1935.

Hon. FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States, The White House,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: My attention has been called repeatedly to the unemployment situation as it exists in southern Minnesota, and I therefore feel it my duty to bring to your attention the discrimination which is being practiced against unemployed individuals who are not on relief.

I wish to call your particular attention to the Public Works project, Dam No. 3 in the Mississippi River, which is being constructed near Red Wing, Minn.

The case, as outlined with reference to Dam No. 3, is identical with the labor situation as it relates to other construction projects on the Mississippi River. Projects are under way at Winona, Minn., La Crosse, Wis., and at other points on the upper Mississippi River.

In order that you may have complete information in regard to local sentiment, I am enclosing herewith resolutions adopted by the Board of County Commissioners of Goodhue County, and letters from the Red Wing Chamber of Commerce and the local Kiwanis Club of that city. The labor organizations of Red Wing and the city council have also taken action, requesting that a change be made in the Executive order which was made by you with reference to the employment of labor in connection with governmental expenditures. As I understand it, the present Executive order provides that 90 percent of labor employed must be taken from the relief rolls. The local relief office at Red Wing has adhered to this order.

Goodhue County, Minn., has an approximate population of 32,000 people. The relief rolls show that there are less than 125 employable men on relief. There are approximately 700 unemployed men, not on relief, registered with the National Reemployment Service. These individuals never have been on relief. The Federal authorities at Red Wing inform me that many of these individuals are entitled to relief, but that they, due to pride and intestinal fortitude, have refused to accept relief either from the Federal Government or local agencies. These men want work, not a dole or relief; but due to the Executive order, which provides that 90 percent must be taken from the relief rolls, it is impossible for these unemployed men, not on relief, to secure work at Dam. No. 3.

I have been informed by Federal authorities that around 1,000 men will be needed in connection with the construction of Dam No. 3. If the unemployed men, not on relief, are not given work in connection with this project, it will not be long before they will be compelled to accept both local and Federal relief doles. Neither they nor do I feel that these people should be punished because of their earnest desire not to be subjects for relief. I, therefore, sincerely ask that you make a change in your present order so that the unemployed generally may be given consideration for work in connection with public-works projects. If you feel you cannot make a general order to this effect, I will be grateful if you will make an exception, so that it will apply to Dam No. 3 and other construction projects in the Mississippi River from Dam No. 3 to and including La Crosse, Wis.

Mr. President, it is a serious matter, in which many people are involved, and I, therefore, sincerely trust that after analyzing the situation you will make possible the employment of several thousand men who have no desire to go on public relief and who are anxious to get work in order to provide for themselves and their families.

Respectfully yours,

AUGUST H. ANDRESEN.

The labor situation outlined for Goodhue County is typical of labor conditions in Houston, Winona, Wabasha, and other counties in southeastern Minnesota. Only a small percentage of the able-bodied unemployed are on relief. The other unemployed have in some way existed during these trying years, and now when work is available they are denied the right to earn an honest dollar for themselves and families, by the administration in Washington. If the present policy is pursued, these people will soon be faced with the shame of seeking public relief. They want work, not a dole or relief.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, every Member of Congress should immediately bring pressure upon the President to change his labor policy so that these courageous unemployed may be given work, when work is available.

NEUTRALITY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, there is no finer chapter in the biography of that great Commander of the Union Army during the Civil War, Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, than that in which he said, "Let us have peace."

Another great American declared, "There never was a good war nor a bad peace." While this, like any generality, is too sweeping to be literally correct, the principle is certainly true. War as a rule is undeniably bad, and peace as a rule is certainly good. In the few instances, such as the American Revolution and the Civil War, in which war was probably unavoidable, it was nevertheless utilized as an emergency method, not as procedure to be followed frequently.

In these closing days of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, it is important for us to be fully aware of the danger arising from the complications in Europe and to be on the alert to prevent being drawn into another insane orgy of slaughter. I am firmly of the opinion that proposals now under consideration in Congress to assure the neutrality of the United States in the event of another war, to prohibit by selling supplies to one side or the other, and to forbid American citizens to entangle themselves in foreign conflicts by traveling in the war zone, except at their own risk, should receive favorable action. In an hour pregnant with uncertainty and risk such as this, we should adopt a policy of immediate and thorough-going preparedness—not the kind that means getting ready for participation in criminally useless international butchery, but the kind that involves preparing to maintain peace and keep out of a blood festival in which the flower of the manhood of warring nations will be sacrificed for profit and pelf.

A very sensible statement is made in a recent issue of the Federal Bulletin, official organ of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. The magazine, after remarking that there is a genuine war threat and that military preparations are wide-spread, says:

> But war is not inevitable. If constructive steps are taken by the United States and other nations, it can be averted.

This is the right attitude. Whatever may occur in Europe or Africa, war is not inevitable for the United States. If anything is inevitable, it ought to be inevitable for us to remain at peace and refuse to be drawn into another carnival of mass murder.

If the world goes crazy, let America stay sane.

I quote from the eloquent words of Congressman James H. Davis, of Texas, in the House of Representatives in February 1916, when he was urging his colleagues to keep out of the World War, participation in which cost us such an appalling price in blood and tears and money.

> While men's imaginations are being excited with visions of invading armies, burning cities, tramping soldiers, fluttering flags, prancing horses, thundering battleships, belching cannons, screaming shot, and bursting shells—the pomp and splendor of war—we appeal to the sanity of the plain people and call upon them to stand steadfast by the teachings of the founders of the Republic and the ancient landmarks of democracy.

MONEY IS ANYTHING WHICH FACILITATES THE EXCHANGE OF GOODS AND SERVICES

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, during the testimony given by Governor Eccles before the House Committee on Banking and Currency I suggested that in a country as rich as this is we ought to be stockholders and not bondholders, and we ought to get rid of the enormous creditor element and creditor complex and manipulation which is going on in this country.

In this power age, where, as a matter of fact, labor is constantly being released from industry, we have got to get some system whereby we can declare a national consumers' dividend either by a direct dividend or by a discount on the price consumers pay for the necessaries of life, reimbursing the merchants for the discount they dispense. Thus we would increase the means of payment needed in business as it expands either with currency or bank deposits placed in the hands of those who will spend as fast as production increases. But under the present system we can do this only by getting into debt faster than we can spend.

The reply Governor Eccles made to my suggestion—although I believe he was in sympathy with it—was a formal defense or apology for the present system of private bank creation of money and loans of such money to the Government.

Mr. Eccles spoke of the very low interest rates now prevailing, which, it seemed to him, produced a far less dangerous situation than debt created on the basis of very high interest. He noted, also, that the debt that the banks create in creating check-book money is in fact only a small part of the total debt of the country.

He failed to note that if the supply of money were created by act of Congress, either as demand bank deposits or as currency, business and the people would not have to pay either interest or the principal.

Now we have to pay to private banking groups, who do not lend it out of anything that they possess either in capital or surplus, both the principal and interest for newly created money which the people themselves create and at the same time pay for by accepting it in exchange for their goods and services.

Let me repeat. The people pay for all newly created money immediately when they part with their goods and services for it. It is not single individuals only but the people as a whole who part with their goods and services for this new money, because the first individuals who accept it from the Government set an endless chain in motion whereby the whole Nation constantly accepts the same money for goods and services, and by this public contract to pass it current the individuals concerned are reimbursed.

The normal and constitutional method should be by act of Congress authorizing the Treasury to issue deposit accounts directly to the people in payments for goods and services, for which the banks, as agents, might legitimately accept a service fee for the bookkeeping involved.

The unconstitutional method is the present one, whereby the banks create the deposit money in default of action by Congress, and without touching their capital and surplus charge it up on their books as a principal debt to them.

The difference between the two methods of money creation by Congress through the Treasury, and money creation by the private banking groups, is the difference between a nation in debt to the banks and a nation out of debt to the banks. If Congress should pay checking deposits to the people in exchange for their goods and services to the Government, and without this fictitious interposition of debt to the bankers, the industries would eventually be able to finance themselves out of common-stock issues which the people could absorb with their cash income instead of financing themselves, as now, largely with bonded indebtedness.

Moreover, while the debt that the banks create in creating the checking deposits for the people's business is, superficially regarded, only a small part of the total debt of the industries, it is the controlling part of the total debt, and the most mischievous part of it.

The history of the depression confirms this statement.

For example, during the depression seventeen and one-half billion dollars of loans, demand and time, were liquidated and not renewed. Of this sum seven and one-half billions was the money used in active demand deposits or checking accounts; these deposits were used in the actual daily turnover of business transactions.

As these demand deposits were exhausted by payment of loans and their nonrenewal, and as borrowers defaulted on their loans, the collateral securities pledged for them were dumped suddenly on the market at auction prices.

This dumping process pulled down the values of all the underlying securities of the Nation.

It pulled down the value of all property in the length and breadth of the United States. It put a damper on all business. It reduced the volume of business transactions per year from eight hundred billions, conservatively reckoned, to four hundred billions and less. It cut the national income in half. The total wealth of the Nation rapidly fell in value from four hundred billions to two hundred billions.

This calamity occurred because the means of payment, which resides principally in debt-created, check-book money and in a little pocket money, was destroyed by one-third. The worth of every dollar owed in the country, that is, the worth in goods to pay a dollar of debt, was rapidly increased by as much as 80 percent.

By such swelling of the purchasing power of every debt-created dollar the very act of bank liquidation and the resultant attempt at total debt liquidation served only to swell the total real debt, instead of reducing it.

The swelling of the worth of every dollar, of course, swelled the unpaid balance of every debt. That is, the dollar which had to be paid increased faster in size than the dollars of debt decreased in number. When this process got started, it went on and on in a vicious circle. As the dollars became fewer and harder to come by, the financial position of even the strongest debtors became weakened, because their collateral securities speedily lost value and had to be increased or sold out.

This vicious tailspin into the trough of depression would have been prevented but for the fact that the money system of the country was in pawn to private groups of individuals—the bankers—who arrogated, and still arrogate, ownership of all demand deposits—check-book money—that go into our public system of exchange.

They arrogate this right to create the money for the Nation without vouchsafing any reason, and in defiance of article I, section 8, clause 5 of the Constitution, which makes the creation of money and the regulation of its value exclusively the function of Congress, in behalf of the whole people.

The gigantic burden of public debt to private groups which has been built up is the result of this chronic borrowing method whereby the people pay twice with goods and services for their means of payment in trade and industry, and by the second payment are liable to have their money canceled out of existence.

If their check-book money had been created by Congress, the principal sums needed for transaction of the Nation's business would have cost nothing; the money would remain in circulation and could not be destroyed, and the service charges entailed in handling the public accounts would have been only the cost of the bookkeeping. Instead the people have had to pay the private banking groups for this bookkeeping service, with interest and with tax warrants besides, equal to the principal sums created. Thus the banks have got a strangle hold on the money supply of the Nation, so that they can deflate the principal sums created without reference to the needs of business for increased circulation of new money as business expands.

I reiterate that the people pay for all new money the moment it is accepted in exchange for the people's goods and services. They should not be made to pay for it all over again through the fiction of debt to private banks who do not have the money to lend in the first place and who base the creation of it upon the national wealth, which is not theirs but belongs to the people.

NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address to be delivered by me tonight over radio stations WMAC, New York City; WOL, Washington; and affiliated stations:

I appreciate the opportunity of addressing you people over this network tonight because of the timeliness of the subject I am to discuss. I address myself briefly to the subject of neutrality legislation of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress which is now driving toward adjournment.

For almost 8 months we have been in session, and some of us were beginning to believe that we would adjourn as preceding Congresses have done since 1918, without taking a single step as a legislative body to remedy the evil which existed in 1917 and which permitted our being drawn and sucked into the great World War.

But for the heroic efforts of Senators CLARK, NYE, and BONE, along with others, we might have adjourned and returned to our several districts to report to the millions of fathers, mothers, sons, and daughters, that with the world facing the present crisis that it does, the Congress did not see fit to enact legislation, in some measure at least, to circumvent the necessity of our young men once more being sent overseas to give their lives and their limbs to make the world safe for the international bankers' dollars.

As a result of the efforts of these men, the Senate yesterday passed Senate Joint Resolution 173 and sent it over to the House for its concurrence. Some doubt now exists as to the possibility of action in that body. A petition is being circulated by Mr. MAVERICK, of Texas; Mr. KVALE, of Minnesota; and myself which reads as follows: "The Senate has passed Senate Joint Resolution 173, commonly known as the 'neutrality resolution.' The undersigned Members of the House insist that some action be taken upon this resolution before Congress adjourns. We feel that we would not be acting in the best interests of the country if we failed to take action on this resolution before adjournment." Every effort will be made to force a vote in the House before adjournment.

Briefly, the resolution comprises three important provisions, one forbidding the shipment of arms, munitions, and implements of war, when a state of war exists, to any belligerent or to any neutral port for transshipment to a belligerent. The second provision forbids American citizens to travel on belligerent ships, except under certain conditions. The third denies the right of a belligerent to send its submarines into any American port or to establish a submarine base in any American port. The resolution passed the Senate without a record vote. Now, it is up to the House. I for one am willing to stay here for the rest of the year, and will vote against any adjournment until this neutrality issue shall have been settled in one way or another.

A glance at the papers on any day is sufficient to convince all of you that Europe today is on the brink of another such disaster as we suffered in 1914–18. What doubt is there that another such great international conflict would destroy our western civilization? In the words of the Emperor of Ethiopia, "If, unhappily, such a conflict leads to a world struggle between the black and white races, the very existence of humanity itself is threatened. I feel that neither the United States nor England nor the other great powers realize the gravity of the situation."

What steps have we taken in an attempt to keep the United States out and her young men at home? Until yesterday in the Senate none. Tonight in the House none.

Can we once more be led foolishly to slaughter? Let me quote Senator BONE briefly at this point:

"I have had assurances—how reliable they are, or how reliable is the source from which they come, I do not know—but there have been intimations that this country of ours has 'commitments'—'commitments', forsooth!—which may, in the event of war again bring the tread of marching feet in our streets and once more compel us to listen to the martial voice of the bugles."

I wonder who in God's name in this country, under the American flag and under our form of government, has a right to make commitments which may take the life of my boy or the boys of other millions of fathers in this country? Who, in the city of Washington, has the unholy power, under our Constitution, to put the boys of America in uniforms, and if need be, and against their will, send them across the seas to die in some foreign land? I wonder how we could ever answer to American mothers for such a crime. In 1917 we sent thousands of them to their deaths on foreign soil. What sort of an answer will there be in the hearts of American mothers to the echoes of the bugles when they again sound the horrible call to arms?

What led us into that human maelstrom in 1917? Allow me to quote from the remarks of Senator VANDENBERG:

"It seems to me perfectly clear, from any critical analysis of our war record from 1914 to 1918, that the absence of a specific neutrality policy, which was effective in its prescriptions, absolutely robbed us of any chance to direct our own subsequent destiny. In reality we were sucked into the war irresistibly in spite of anything we could do to prevent the ultimate process. It was the failure to have an affirmative neutrality policy which effectively quarantined us against the results of our previous pseudo neutrality, which ultimately created a situation in which we were the victims of our own failure to have the precise kind of a rule which it is now proposed the United States shall announce and announce in time."

What did he mean? The answer is contained in a letter from the then Secretary of State, Robert Lansing, to the President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, on September 6, 1915.

A summarization of that letter pictures only too clearly the events, concocted by those blinded by greed for the almighty dollar and an inhuman disregard for the lives of others in its quest, that led a once peace-loving people to the very edge of the abyss and produced the final, foolish fact of men gone mad shooting one another for what reason God only knows.

But to the Lansing letter.

"MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Doubtless Secretary McAdoo has discussed with you the necessity of floating Government loans for the belligerent nations, which are purchasing such great quantities of goods in this country, in order to avoid a serious financial situation which would not only affect them but this country as well."

What events had transpired to inspire this comment from Mr. Wilson's Secretary of State?

Prior to the outbreak of hostilities the United States Government had made no statement of policy on the sale of munitions. We had announced no neutrality policy. Armament manufacturers sold munitions of war to the belligerents. After the war had started it was impossible for Congress to form a new policy without incurring representations that such a new policy involved the taking of sides against one particular belligerent. Thus the sales had to continue.

After the mushroom growth of war purchases by belligerents it became evident that European governments would go bankrupt if they tried to pay for those purchases in gold, and an industrial depression in this country would have followed. The only alternative was for us to loan money to the belligerents. The first great Anglo-French loan of $500,000,000 was floated by a syndicate headed by J. P. Morgan & Co.

André Tardieu, former Premier of France, commented that after these foreign loans had been floated, "from that time on, whether desired or not, the victory of the Allies became essential to the United States."

So, Mr. President, Robert Lansing wrote:

"My opinion is that we ought to allow the loans to be made for our own good, and I have been seeking some means of harmonizing our policy, so unconditionally announced, with the flotation of general loans. As yet I have found no solution to the problem.

"Secretary McADOO considers that the situation is becoming acute and that something should be done at once to avoid the disastrous results which will follow a continuance of the present policy."

For the sake of profit, for dollars, to protect the loans of certain interests in this country, 50,000 boys now lie buried in France. Thousands of others are in insane asylums. Thousands are in hospitals or will be, and we now face the possibility of repeating the supreme economic and social folly of 1917.

It has been 17 years since we ended the war with Europe and we have not done a thing to keep from being drawn into another one. There is not a line of law to reflect the concern of Lansing and others because of this country's lack of preparation in the way of legislation to define policies of neutrality in the case of another European war.

Neutrality, as history shows, is hard to maintain. Once America gets a start in a foreign war, through trades or credits, we are apt to be drawn in as we were in 1917. There is no certain escape from this danger. But we at least can take obvious precautions.

I cannot refrain from saying at this point, purely as a matter of opinion, that as long as gold glitters for the greedy, wars will be inevitable. But, while we strive to eliminate the cause of war, let us take the necessary precautions to guard against being pulled into an European catastrophe against the will of the people.

It is to be regretted that the resolution does not contain some provisions affecting the extending of credits of any kind to belligerents. However, we will take what we can get with the expectation of asking for more later.

The House must pass Senate Joint Resolution 173 before it adjourns, before it is too late. We will not be back until January 3, I hope.

CONVENTION OF THE NATIONAL RURAL LETTER CARRIERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by me before the Convention of the National Rural Letter Carriers Association, Boston, Mass., August 21, 1935.

Mr. Chairman and friends of the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association, it has been my privilege to address gatherings of many organizations, but I can truthfully assure you that in no instance have I felt more genuine interest in the work of the assemblages before which I was to appear than I feel today. As a farmer, a man of the common people familiar with their needs and desires and circumstances from boyhood up, I know better than many men in public life the value of the service rendered by rural letter carriers. I know what it means to the farmer who lives at a distance from a village and post office—the farmer on the back road. I know what it would mean to the farmer is such a service were withdrawn. I also know something of the sacrifices that rural letter carriers are obliged to undergo in order to make certain that the farmer really gets his mail regularly and promptly in the bitter blizzards of winter as well as in the sunny days of summer.

You are fulfilling a function in society that is totally different from that of any other group of public servants. Each group has its place, to be sure, but I venture to say that a great many of them would hesitate long and seriously before they would abandon their more comfortable and easy positions for the toil and patient effort that are required of rural letter carriers.

It is not necessary for me to tell you that I am 100 percent in favor of any and all legislation that will benefit carriers so long as it does not conflict with good public policy. I have frequently cooperated with your able and efficient national president, W. G. Armstrong, and his associates, and I am confident that they will confirm my assertion that I am consistently an advocate of proper statutory protection of your rights and interests.

You are aware, of course, of my championship of a program of road building that would take the farmer out of the mud. I may explain that this program would equally take the rural carrier out of the mur for it would substitute modern stone and gravel roads for mud roads.

Throughout the country there are about 3,000,000 miles of highways outside of cities in the United States. Two million miles of this distance consists of mud roads—roads over which travel is possible and convenient in dry periods of the year, but almost impossible in time of snow, sleet, and rain—which are a perpetual menace to trade, health, and efficient mail service. It is a striking and an unpleasant fact that this country has 2,000,000 miles of such highways. A highly developed country like ours, with the greatest machines and inventions that science can devise, ought to have decent roads everywhere.

Construction of good stone and gravel roads to back farms that I have been urging will enable farmers to get to town at any season of the year and will make the task of the rural letter carrier a far less burdensome one.

Following many appeals to Federal officials by myself in cooperation with Mr. Armstrong, your national president, and other public-spirited men, there has been allocated $800,000,000 of the $4,880,000,000 works-relief fund for highway construction and grade-crossing elimination. This money, as I understand it, is to be divided about equally between these two classes of work, allowing $400,000,000 for roads. It has been stipulated that not less than 25 percent of the money apportioned for roads shall be used for farm-to-market highways.

In all frankness, I am not satisfied with this arrangement, and I feel that a much larger sum is needed to do justice to rural sections. However, I welcome it as an important step in the right direction, and I hope that further steps of the same nature will be taken.

When I arrived in Washington as a freshman in the congressional class, I had no personal ambitions, but I did want to be assigned to the House Committee on Roads. I am somewhat familiar with the subject of roads, have studied it for years, and have had considerable practical experience along that line—and practical experience is the best education anybody can ever get on any subject. My wish was granted and I received the assignment to the Roads Committee. I have spent many hours each week in committee meetings and in conference with highway officials and specialists. From the outset I carried on an agitation for back-to-the-farm roads, and my views received respectful attention from my fellow members of the committee. The committee reported a bill carrying an appropriation of a billion dollars for highways, of which $300,000,000 was to be for these back roads. To my disappointment this item was finally stricken out, despite my best efforts to have it retained.

Just about this time Congress passed the bill appropriating $4,880,000,000 for public works on which men on relief were to be employed. It occurred to me that a portion of this money could be utilized for roads, even if my suggested item of $300,000,000 in the committee bill had been dropped. I took the matter up with Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace, Harry L. Hopkins, Federal Emergency Relief Administrator—who is also now Works Progress Administrator—Thomas MacDonald, Chief of the Bureau of Roads, and President Roosevelt himself. When I say that I "took it up" with these officials, I do not mean that I simply wrote them letters or called them on the telephone—although I did both—but that I went further and had lengthy personal talks with them. I went to the White House and discussed the entire subject fully with the President, with whom I had been acquainted when he was Governor and when I was a member of the New York State Legislature. In all of these instances I approached the topic from a strictly civic and nonpartisan standpoint, for it has always been my policy to try to secure the most beneficial legislation for the people, cooperating wherever possible with the members of all parties who take the same broad view.

Regulations have recently been promulgated by the Works Progress Administration for applications for Federal aid for rural roads. As you know, each State has its W. P. A. director, and the States are divided into districts, with directors in charge of each district. There are over 300 such districts throughout the country.

In formulating projects the sponsoring agency should confer with the local district office of the Works Progress Administration for information concerning the number and occupation of persons on relief rolls who are to be put to work. Sponsors should, it is stated, utilize the facilities of local and State planning boards in the formulation of projects. The sponsoring governmental agency is expected to contribute equipment, materials, and services to the maximum amount possible. The priority of the project will depend in part on the amount of each contribution and the extent to which these contributions increase the proportion of labor cost to the total Federal funds required.

The application, when completed, is filed with the district director of the W. P. A. After he has approved it, it is passed on to the State director for approval, and, if approved by him, it is forwarded to Washington for the O. K. of the Works Progress Administrator, the Allotment Board, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller General, and the President of the United States.

After the project has been approved by all of these officials and returned to the local office, work can be begun at once, provided there are men on relief rolls who have no other employment.

Twenty to thirty days—and in some cases a much longer period—will be needed for the project to pass through the route I have described. Personally, I believe there is too much red tape and that some of it should be cut. I see no reason for so lengthy and complicated a circuit. I am always in favor of getting things done as promptly and in as simple and direct a fashion as possible. This rule applies in commercial matters and it ought to be observed in Government. In geometry we were taught that a straight line is the shortest distance between two points. My philosophy is that the more we follow straight lines in the business of Government and eliminate twists and turns and unnecessary details, the quicker we shall accomplish something of real benefit to the average citizen.

However, in spite of my disapproval of the involved and confusing procedure that must be gone through in order to have a project approved, I have outlined it for the information of those interested. Such an explanation might seem out of place in an address before the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association, but I know that there is no class to which better roads will mean more than the men who carry mail to country homes on back roads. So I felt it would be worth while to tell you just what has to be done in obtaining Government help. You will, as a result, be better able to cooperate with farmers whenever you wish to do so in preparing applications and in determining just what you want to ask for.

I may add that, while I wish a more comprehensive and far-reaching program had been given official sanction, it took a great deal of steady work to get even this much authorized. I have already mentioned the splendid assistance I received from your president, Mr. Armstrong, and his fellow officials in your association. I should likewise give credit to the National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, Charles M. Upham, of the American Road Builders' Association, and a number of other prominent men.

Last but not least an immense debt of gratitude is due the thousands of rural carriers who have circulated petitions and sent out a mass of letters advocating the improvement of country roads. I have received a mass of correspondence from carriers in nearly every State in the Union, and they have furnished much valuable information showing the poor condition of the highways over which they travel in discharging their daily duties. One man sent me a photo showing the boat in which he is obliged to deliver mail in rainy spells. Others have forwarded photos and detailed descriptions of roads that are at times mudholes and creeks rather than public thoroughfares.

The facts given by rural carriers have been of tremendous assistance in proving the need of building new and enduring roads.

The result of these continuous efforts was, as you know, the decision to construct farm-to-market roads where the labor was available and men were on relief—and the amount to be spent may reach even beyond $600,000,000. In the long run, therefore, I—with my helpers, Mr. Armstrong and others—have succeeded in getting this important work started, although what has so far been mapped out is only a beginning. We must exert ourselves to see that this is a permanent enterprise, so that we continue to build roads after the stress of the times is over.

This expenditure will go far toward relieving the present unfortunate situation and taking the mail carriers out of the mud. There should be a more adequate expenditure and with your assistance I shall keep on working until we secure it. There should also be a slashing of red tape, as I have said, and I shall likewise do all within my power toward that end. But I do feel considerable satisfaction that we have accomplished what we have—and I may add that it was not easy to get as far as we have gone.

I have not attempted to deliver an oration to you today, for I know you prefer facts that vitally affect you. By doing these unromantic and matter-of-fact things, it seems to me, we are of more service than when we make highfaluting speeches and deal in flowery phrases. The older I grow, the more firmly I believe in plain, practical human helpfulness—with no frills or put on.

In closing, I cannot better analyze my philosophy than to quote that famous poem of Sam Foss:

"There are hermit souls that live withdrawn
In the peace of their self-content;
There are souls, like stars, that dwell apart
In a fellowless firmament;
There are pioneer souls that blaze their paths
Where highways never ran;
But let me live by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

"Let me live in my house by the side of the road,
It's here the race of men go by—
They are good, they are bad, they are weak, they are strong,
Wise—foolish—so am I.
Then why should I sit in the scorner's seat,
Or hurl the cynic's ban?
Let me live in my house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man."

THE ALIEN REGISTRATION ACT OF 1935

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend remarks in the RECORD, I include the following: On Monday, August 19, 1935, I introduced a bill known as "H. R. 9175", the purpose of which is to provide for the registration of the estimated 5,000,000 aliens that are now in and those who may in the future come to this country.

To require all aliens now here and those who may come to this country to obtain from the Federal Government by paying the prescribed fee a permit before they can be employed or go into business; to discourage the unlawful entry of aliens into this country; to provide what in effect may be considered an identification system for all aliens who comply with the conditions set forth in this act; to establish a uniform system under which acceptable foreign citizens may enter the United States for the purpose of engaging in business or to seek employment; to enable the Federal Government to determine who are acceptable aliens; to provide a system by which all aliens now in this country may contribute to the costs of government in recognition of the favors granted them; to encourage acceptable classes of aliens to become citizens of the United States; to adequately provide against the entry into this country of all undesirable aliens; to provide for the deportation of all undesirable aliens, including those who are now on relief rolls; to protect the American wage earners from the competition of cheap alien labor; to create a more profound respect for and a greater appreciation of the benefits of American citizenship and to provide a new source of revenue.

It is estimated that the registration fees provided under this act will amount to $100,000,000 annually and that the removal of aliens now on relief rolls will result in a saving to the Government including both State and Federal of over $200,000,000 a year. At the present time it seems doubtful if the ordinary tax sources of revenue will be sufficient to ever balance our Federal Budget. It is, therefore, imperative that if we are ever to have a stable Federal financial policy new sources of revenue must be developed. I believe that this bill will provide an appreciable amount of revenue and also effect a substantial saving in relief costs.

The burden on the American taxpayer in caring for indigent aliens is worthy of the utmost consideration.

Many prominent patriotic and civic organizations have endorsed the principle of this bill—the American Citizens' Protective Association of Chicago, various posts of the American Legion, the Order of Ahepa, and others.

I realize the fact that this bill cannot become a law during this session of Congress. I am introducing it for the purpose of calling the attention of Members of Congress to the principle of alien registration, hoping that the bill will become law at the next session of Congress.

MODERN METHODS IN WORLD TRADE

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by myself August 15:

In the spring of 1933 certain ominous facts pertaining to foreign trade were evident. During the preceding 4 years world trade had decreased approximately 66 percent, while United States foreign trade had dropped 75 percent.

Foreign governments had developed a new technic in their war for trade supremacy. Trade quotas, currency manipulation, import licenses, exchange pools, reciprocity treaties, and many other instruments of attack and defense had supplanted the antiquated weapon of rigid tariffs. In such a war we simply had no chance, even with our close and natural customers. In 9 years our ratio of Cuban imports had dropped from two-thirds to one-half; our South American trade, so well established during the World War, was rapidly disappearing. Our warehouses were overloaded with agricultural surpluses. Our factories that had produced for export were closed and American capital was building plants and employing labor abroad.

Obviously two courses were open—we could either continue our past inaction and watch our foreign trade vanish, or we could employ some of the instrumentalities of our competitors and endeavor to regain lost ground.

To ignore our foreign markets presented apparent difficulties. A country that contains 6 percent of the world's population, but produces 58 percent of its corn, 52 percent of its cotton, 34 percent of its coal, and 46 percent of its copper must either find a market for its surpluses or discontinue production.

This latter solution would have required the transfer of displaced farmers and miners to manufacturing pursuits, where unprecedented unemployment already existed. It was utterly hopeless to sell our agricultural products abroad unless we could take some merchandise in exchange. There was not enough gold in the world to pay for prolonged exportation, and even if it were desirable for us to accumulate all of the world's gold in this manner it was too much to expect foreign nations to buy and exhaust their own gold supply where they could not sell.

We attempted a reduction of agricultural products through the Agricultural Adjustment Act and by the process taxes avoided for a time the necessity of employing displaced farmers in manufacturing, but none of us wish to continue crop control as a permanent policy and we do not like to pay process taxes even if they are constitutional. We yearn for the normal operation of economic laws; we dislike artificial planning and we want the farmer to grow his crops and sell them at a profit. To do this we must have back our world markets, otherwise there was no hope of any permanence in recovery.

This was the paramount conception of the Roosevelt administration, and both offensive and defensive measures, heretofore used only by our competitors, were at once adopted. Power was granted our Executive to impose limitations and prohibitions in addition to tariff duties; our currency was modified to meet foreign attack; provision was made to finance import and export business; a fund was set aside to neutralize foreign-exchange manipulation; but, more important than all, the President was authorized by Congress to enter into reciprocal trade agreements.

These agreements have been a potent stimulus to foreign trade; they have placed the making of tariff schedules on a scientific basis, and they have greatly advanced the cause of international good will.

So far five agreements have been completed and signed. Four of these are in effect, but the Cuban agreement is the only one which has been in force long enough to give any definite indications of its beneficial operation. This agreement shows that a marked stimulus has been given by it to the trade between the two countries. While it will be a matter of years before the permanent effects of the new policy will be known, nevertheless a twofold purpose has been initiated: (1) There is undisputed evidence of improved economic conditions in our neighboring republic; and (2) a market for some American goods has been partially regained in that country. Our exports to Cuba for the first 10 months of the agreement were about $17,000,000 greater than for an immediately similar period before it went into effect. Imports from Cuba have similarly increased under the agreement.

Exports of important American products to Cuba during the first 9 months of the trade agreement as compared with the corresponding 9 months of 1933 and 1934 compare as follows:

	1933	1934
Automobiles:
Passenger cars, number	416	1,750
Trucks, do	695	1,486
Tires:
Pneumatic, do	51,620	70,401
Solid, do	805	1,431
Radio sets, do	7,053	23,182
Lard, kilos	5,232,867	11,734,596
Wheat flour, bags	665,158	750,801
Lumber, board feet	17,166,702	23,066,064

As to the effect of our new policy on our foreign trade generally, fluctuations in currency values of all the leading nations make such reports very confusing. However, the League of Nations reports on world commerce just released show that in quantity world foreign commerce has increased approximately 5 percent in 1934 over 1932; whereas, United States foreign trade has increased approximately 8 percent. This report on world trade included the United States, so that our gain is not shown as favorably by the figures as the facts would justify. Obviously, some force has been working to the benefit of American commerce that is not in existence elsewhere, and it is conceivable that our newly established attitude of being a good neighbor in trade as well as in diplomacy probably has had some beneficial effect.

For the first time an opportunity is given with the Reciprocal Tariff Act to deal with tariffs scientifically in the United States on the basis of studies by qualified experts. Under the present procedure no rate is changed until after committees of experts from all interested departments of the Government have conducted a thorough study of every aspect of the situation and have given attention to the testimony of domestic industries which might be affected by a change. The aim of the Government in joining in trade agreements is to serve the collective interests of the entire population; the interest of all must be considered, whether local or not. It is realized that any change in our tariff rates must be made without violence to domestic industries and will have to be made so that domestic industries may accommodate themselves to new conditions.

In arriving at an agreement there is truly national as well as international cooperation. In the first place, the interests of domestic industries are taken care of by the careful studies of the impartial experts of the Government. All points of view are invited before an agreement is negotiated. After the body of experts has decided on what concessions may be made with the least injury to domestic industries, the international phase, or bargaining with the foreign country, is undertaken. It has been represented by the opposition that such bargaining goes on behind closed doors where the domestic industry has nothing to say about the concessions, and that the foreign interests are in a better position to influence the negotiations than the domestic producers. This is far from the truth. The positions of the domestic interests are well understood before representatives of the Government sit down with foreign governments in the cooperative give-and-take bargaining spirit.

It is useless for the people of good will throughout the world to talk about peace on earth so long as we have economic forces that are driving some nations to a choice between starvation and a war for open markets. Human beings will not willingly starve nor see their offspring suffer from want. By contrast, the horrors of war afford a pleasant escape. With the world divided up into trade-tight tariff-walled compartments, we may continue to expect national freebooting tactics such as those in Manchuria and Ethiopia when a nation with a teeming population can no longer get access to markets peaceably.

The trade-agreements program has been devised as a means whereby we may avoid, so far as possible, further restrains upon the natural exchange of commodities between nations and provide for the gradual removal of existing restrictions. The program is an attempt to facilitate a cooperative solution which will satisfactorily eliminate some of the undesirable changes or further serious dislocations in world trade. This program is cherished by the administration because its sponsors believe that the principle upon which it is based is the true foundation, not only for universal material well-being, but also for the establishment of peaceful relations throughout the world. It is believed by many that almost all disagreeable qualities which develop in mankind grow out of the bitter struggle for existence. Ethical tenets and moral laws are ineffective in the presence of hunger and the instinct of self-preservation. Economic necessities have caused wars, and wars again have produced economic necessities, so that a vicious circle has been perpetuated with the innumerable victims seemingly helpless to break the continuity of its cruel and relentless operation. The present economic exigencies in some countries are heading toward war; but because we have failed in the past is no reason why further attempts should not be made in attacking this vicious evil.

The reciprocal trade agreements policy recognizes the economic interdependence of nations and seeks to enlist the cooperation of other countries in organizing it. In the present requirements of our civilization there is not a country which is or can be wholly self-sufficient; which, in other words, means that all nations are interdependent if they would realize their fullest possibility of material development. Many countries, by indicating their readiness to join in the movement, seem to reveal that they have lost faith in methods of exclusion and their action gives reason to expect that before long a marked loosening of the bonds of international trade will be effected. The Trade Agreements Act opens up the possibility of an entirely new method of dealing with the tariff, which is a recognized cause of much ill will throughout the world.

A most appropriate conclusion for a talk of this kind are the remarks of former President McKinley, made just before his death. He had been a high-tariff advocate, but in discussing the subject he said, over a generation ago, "The period of exclusiveness is passed. Commercial wars are unprofitable; reciprocal treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not."

THE HOLDING COMPANY LOBBY AND THE MONOPOLY OF ELECTRICITY

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, on August 1, by vote of this House the members of the conference committee considering the disagreeing votes of the House and Senate on the utility holding bill, were instructed by motion to exclude attorneys from their sessions and deny themselves legal advice. Since this vote denying the conferees considering the utility holding company bill legal advice, there has been an admission and conclusive showing that this action is in pursuance of a lobby strategy long resorted to to gain unfair advantage.

LOBBY STRATEGY

It is an old strategy of lobbying on failure to defeat a bill in committee to suggest some trick amendments to fill the bill with "jokers" and to make it unconstitutional.

This old lawyer lobby strategy was explained August 9, 1935, by Robert W. Lyons, testifying before the chain-store investigation committee. Lyons was a chain-store lobbyist and was charged with offering amendments to make a bill unconstitutional.

Lyons told the investigation committee in answer to this charge of submitting amendments that he would not hesitate to amend a measure when necessary to make it invalid and unconstitutional, and that he considered such practices as perfectly fair in opposing legislation. (Chain store committee hearings Aug. 9, 1935, directed by the House of Representatives, conducted in Washington, D. C., as reported by the Washington Post Aug. 10, 1935, p. 9, column 7.)

KILLING BILLS IN COMMITTEE

It has been shown a policy of the utility lobby to first attack pending legislation before the committees where pending and having jurisdiction to consider bills to regulate the service or contract rates and defeat or modify its provisions before the legislation could be brought out for consideration. The utility lobby reporting in April 1927 to utility high officials on legislation in the Kansas Legislature used these very significant words:

The public utilities did not suffer much at the hands of the last legislature. Most of the adverse stuff getting hit with an ax before it got out of committee. (Fed. Tr. Rept. 71–A, p. 18; exhibits 5 and 6, p. 716, Senate exhibit 3077.)

PLEADING FOR WIDOWS AND ORPHANS

While the utility holding companies were assuming to forget self and their own interests and pleading the cause of the small stockholder and the widows and orphans as investors, the following from the lobby committee hearings was published in the Washington News August 15, 1935, at page 43:

One of the investors in H. C. Hopson's Associated Gas & Electric Co. who bought in at $60 a share with her life's savings has taken to circularizing members of the Senate Lobby Committee.

Her mimeographed letter, signed by Vanita Crofoot, and giving her address in Seattle, urges support of the Wheeler-Rayburn utility bill "or its equivalent." The letter continues:

"I should gladly welcome Government control even to the extent of the Government owning such companies in order to protect future investors. I placed my life earnings in the Associated Gas & Electric Co., paying $60 a share, and now it is quoted on the New York curb at 11/16. The company's statements do not warrant this drop.

"The Associated Gas & Electric Co. has sent me several communications asking me to write Senators and Representatives of the evils of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill. On the contrary, I wish to urge you to vote for the annihilation of the holding companies because of the benefits that will accrue to the stockholders of the future."

TAKING FROM SMALL STOCKHOLDERS

The following, from the hearings of the Senate Lobby Investigating Committee, shows how these utility corporations have made billions taking from operating companies and forcing these operating companies to collect their tribute from the people, as reported by Donald Ramsey to the press August 27, 1935:

It was brought out that Hopson and his partner, A. J. Mange, had gone into the utility business on a "shoestring"—about $10,000 of borrowed money. Starting with that "white chip", they have during the last 12 or 13 years organized a baffling series of corporations and exercised autocratic control over operating power companies valued at $900,000,000.

The following from the utility lobby hearings shows how the utility corporations, after selling stock to small stockholders, had robbed them of their dividends, as reported to the press by Donald Ramsey August 27, 1935:

They have unmercifully "milked" these operating companies for their private profit.

For example, Hopson admitted that from 1929 to 1933, while the Associated Gas & Electric was refusing to pay dividends to investors, his personally owned company "serving" the A. G. & E. system was netting him profits totaling $2,187,604.

CORPORATIONS

Corporations are artificial persons, created and authorized by law, in aid of industry, commerce, and trade, given increased and multiplied powers over individuals or natural persons. And they have served a useful purpose under our industrial system. The State or Nation, creating the corporation as a fiction of law, with great and special powers, have reserved or attempted to reserve the right of supervision and control to safeguard against the evils and abuses of corporations and to limit their uses to the purposes intended.

But the holding corporations, coming in under the general laws, under which the necessary corporations are created, have taken charge of the operating companies, in usurpation of the regulatory powers of the State, and through control of the operating companies are defying and challenging the States creating them.

The laws and courts have gone too far in creating and permitting the legal fiction of corporations or artificial persons, supercorporations with power to control over other corporations and subordinate the powers of the State.

HOLDING CORPORATIONS

If the dependencies and interdependencies of holding-company operations have become so great and complex that such companies cannot be interfered with without bringing calamity and disaster, then it is high time to call a halt to the further growth and development of holding corporations and their powers before the confusion of industrial tongues brings a fall to our economic tower.

All forms of supercorporations, which exist only to exercise and usurp the sovereign powers of the State for the control and regulation of other corporations, to safeguard the rights of natural persons against corporate imposition and encroachment, should be outlawed and dissolved.

INVESTIGATIONS BEGINNING BACK IN 1928

It is found that the investigation leading up to the preparation of this bill begun back under the Coolidge administration, on the 15th day of February 1928, when the Senate passed resolution no. 83.

This resolution was prompted by the ever-growing evils and abuses of public-utility and holding companies, but more immediately and directly by the public-utility holding companies' lobby appearing in Washington in 1927 to oppose the enactment of legislation looking to a trial of public ownership. Under this Senate Resolution No. 83 the Federal Trade Commission was authorized and directed to make inquiry regarding the service performed by holding companies and the value and prices for such service and the activities of holding companies to control public opinion and legislation.

The Federal Trade Commission promptly entered upon this investigation under the powers and authorities of the resolution and continued its hearings and inquiry until some time during 1934, in all a period of over 6 years. The report of this Commission was filed December 12, 1934, and on the convening of Congress in 1935 the matters were called before Congress by a special message of the President recommending that action be taken to remedy the evils and abuses of holding companies as shown to exist by the report.

It was this inquiry and investigation of the Federal Trade Commission authorized under Senate Resolution 83, in 1928, that brought out the abuses of public holding companies and its evil practices and made this legislation imperative to safeguard bona fide stockholders and the consuming public from this imposition.

COMPLETED BY LOBBY HEARINGS

If the Federal trade report, 71–A, with its record showing a long list of frauds, perjuries, and conspiracies, was not enough to explain the means and methods whereby the utility bill was defeated, the Senate and House lobby investigation, following the vote on the holding bill, completed the chapter of maneuvers to mislead the people of the country and to terrorize Members of Congress and left nothing for surmise.

HOLDING COMPANIES AND TAXATION

But holding companies do not only use their confusing and bewildering stratas to take from unsuspecting stockholders and to exact and take from the people, but they use these complicated forms to cover and conceal their property from taxation.

And in the meantime, early in 1933, when Congress was called in special session, the vacant condition of the Treasury prompted a Senate inquiry of the causes, and it was found that the great financial interests had not been and were not paying taxes on their earnings and incomes for more than 3 years.

And it was further found and disclosed under the inquiry by the Senate committee that incomes of many corporations were being hidden, covered, and concealed, and taxes due upon these incomes evaded by manipulation and jugglery through the means of holding companies. But at that time the Senate investigation under Resolution No. 83 was not complete and no report was made, and the matter was postponed and further continued awaiting the completion of the hearing and report of the facts found.

PAID NEWSPAPER PROPAGANDA

The summary report of the Federal Trade Commission, among other matters brought to light, shows that a publicity utility association was organized prior to 1927, following after the Insull plan, and referred to in the hearings as the "Illinois plan", for the control of public opinion and legislation in the interest of holding companies. Up to 1927 over $38,000,000 had been spent by this association annually, paid for publication of articles and prepared editorials and for expenses in obtaining personal contacts with thousands of editors of the country.

FINANCING PUBLIC SPEAKERS

Another means of publicity shown followed was by financing a great army of local, State, and national speakers to present their facts to the public favorable to public holding companies and this extended to communities and to churches, schools, and college audiences.

PUPILS, TEACHERS, AND SCHOOLS

The following is from the Indianapolis News, November 26, 1934, page 4, reviewing the advance report of the Federal Trade Commission investigating holding companies, showing the program to influence pupils, teachers, and college professors:

WASHINGTON, November 26.—The Federal Trade Commission in another installment of its report on utility propaganda places at $1,312,264 the amount expended by the electric power and gas industries among educators, schools, and universities for the purpose of creating favorable public opinion.

"The framers of the good-will campaign clearly understood the importance of educators and their students in shaping opinion and carefully and comprehensively made the most of it", the report reads.

The utility program for educators and schools from kindergarten to university was designed to mold the thoughts and beliefs of the present and future generations in conformity with the utility interests.

HOLDING COMPANIES TAKE FROM SMALL STOCKHOLDERS

The Senate Lobby Investigating Committee brought facts by admissions showing both how the utility owners have made millions in profits, while the small individual stockholders have been realizing very low dividends, if any, on the stock investments.

The following is from the Washington News, August 20, 1935, page 1 thereof, reporting the evidence given before this committee:

Hopson tells lobby inquiry he received $3,187,064 profits.

Utilities magnate admits private service firms' net income; no dividends paid.

Howard C. Hopson told the Senate Lobby Committee today that $3,187,064.01 profits from his private service companies in 5 years "didn't go to anybody else" except the Hopson family.

For several years during that time, the record showed, Hopson's Associated Gas & Electric Co. paid no dividends.

As every vital necessary of life, every means and element required to live, is subject to be seized upon and held for ransom, tribute, and profit, so electricity has been seized upon to take from the people through excessive charges. It has been shown by the investigation conducted by the Federal Trade Commission that distributing lines and equipment to carry electricity to the people have been constructed and provided under interest and usury charges, sometimes as high as 8 percent, compounded semiannually.

SAMPLE OF LETTERS SENT TO CONGRESSMEN

The following is a fair sample of the letters which were prompted and sent out by the made-to-order small stockholders, and which were sent to mislead, confuse, and terrorize Members of Congress in the consideration of the utility bill to eliminate unnecessary holding companies and to relieve the operating companies, the patrons, and consumers from the exacting charges imposed upon them:

Representative FINLY H. GRAY,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: May I tell you frankly that if you vote in favor of this bill that I shall use every honorable means at my command to see that you are never again returned to public office.

AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION IS NOTHING TO "GET EXCITED ABOUT"

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, in the last few months I suppose more guff and nonsense, not to mention malicious misinformation, has been peddled about on the American Constitution than at any time in our history. The fact that anyone should mention an amendment to the Constitution is cause for spiteful character assassination. Amending the Constitution is certainly constitutional, for amending it is provided in the Constitution itself. This is certainly an elementary statement. We all revere our forefathers, most of us at least as much as those who pretentiously blat in the public prints, but we also know that our forefathers were practical, intelligent, liberal men, who created this Nation by revolting against England, and who thereafter set up a constitutional government, providing for constitutional amendments and changes. The purpose in doing this was to forever make the forcible overthrow of government unnecessary and improper—making the ballot the basis of changes to meet future conditions.

I am therefore pleased to note a change in the tendency of the conservative press on that point. One of the most conservative papers in America is the San Antonio Express, which is published in my district, the twentieth, of Texas. Let me quote briefly from an editorial written by its chief editorial writer, Hon. Mike Harris:

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT AND INTERPRETATION

In a memorable address to the Institute of Human Relations at Williams College, Dr. Frank P. Graham, president of the University of North Carolina, lately spoke a thought which is pertinent to the country-wide Constitution Day observance:

The real threats to the Republic and to the fundamental law upon which it stands come from "those who would keep the Constitution brittle and inflexible to the vital needs of an organic society."

Indeed—as is frequently pointed out—the Constitution has survived these 148 years amid the wreck of empires and world-wide social revolution because it has proved adaptable to ever-changing conditions. In other words, it has been not a fixed code but a living instrument. Consequently, with remarkably slight change in content, it has served the great industrial empire of the twentieth, as well as it served the loosely bound frontier agricultural commonwealth of the late eighteenth, century.

After this sensible explanation, the editorial proceeds concerning amendments:

As Dr. Graham reminded his audience, the Constitution provides means for its own amendment. He intimated that one might advocate changes in the fundamental law—according to one's own lights—without being guilty of treason. In fact, the educator—presumably having in mind the Supreme Court's N. R. A. decision—expressed the opinion that the time had come to extend the Bill of Rights to embrace such guarantees as "the right to honest work", an industry-wide "minimum standard of hours, wages, and fair competition", social security, and the like.

Then this conservative paper proceeds as follows about the "red revolution":

However that may be, the threat of "red revolution" or the risk that the American people will enter upon any highly dangerous political experiment by constitutional amendment is too remote to merit serious consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether a constitutional amendment is necessary for our country or not. Time will tell. But if a constitutional amendment is necessary, or thought to be necessary, the machinery for peaceful adoption exists, and should be used. My constituents, like those all over America, have voted to change the Constitution several times in the last few years. And just in the last 2 weeks we Texans voted on many amendments to our State constitution—in fact, old-age pensions would have been impossible except for one of the amendments. That was a social change voted by the people in an orderly, constitutional way, which amended the constitution of my State.

The question is so simple that it seems silly to mention it. If the people want to change the Constitution, they should do so. The Constitution says so itself. And in addition, unlike our forefathers who had no permission from their forefathers to set up a new republic and a new social order, we have the written permission of our forefathers to make changes when, as, and if we please. Having been forced by conditions to resort to force, our forefathers wisely decided a way for us to make such changes as we wish in an orderly, peaceful way.

THE SUPREME COURT, THE CONGRESS, AND THE CHIEF EXECUTIVE

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, in my speech delivered in this House on July 23, 1935, I called attention to the dangerous judiciary encroachment on legislative powers and of the necessity of a liberalizing constitutional amendment.

On the 25th day of July 1935 there appeared in the Washington Times and other Hearst newspapers a syndicated article by one James T. Williams, Jr., which misrepresented my views in the following way:

Currying favor with the reds, pinks, and yellows of politics by mendacious attacks upon the Supreme Court of the United States and contemptuous misrepresentations of the framers of the Federal Constitution is now a favorite trick among the political sappers in Congress.

The article then proceeds with vituperation and diatribe attempting to place me in the category of a "red, pink, or yellow" in American politics.

Anyone who is familiar with my record in Congress for the last 30 years is fully aware of the utter baselessness of this charge. But if I am a "red, pink, or a yellow", then what was Thomas Jefferson, when he wrote in his letter to Judge Spencer Roane on September 6, 1819:

My construction of the Constitution is very different from what you quote. It is that each department is truly independent of the others and has an equal right to decide for itself what is the meaning of the Constitution in the cases submitted to its action, and especially whether it is to act ultimately and without appeal.

In his letter to Thomas Ritchie dated December 25, 1820, Jefferson said:

It is not from this branch of Government we have most to fear. Taxes and short elections will keep them right. The judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners constantly working underground to undermine the foundations of our confederate fabric. They are construing our Constitution from a coordination of a great and special government to a general and supreme one alone. * * * Having found from experience that impeachment is an impractical thing, a mere scarecrow, they consider themselves secure for life; they skulk from responsibility to public opinion, the only remaining hold on them in a practice first introduced into England by Lord Mansfield.

An opinion is huddled up in conclave, perhaps by a majority, delivered as if unanimous, and with the silent acquiescence of lazy or time associates by a crafty chief judge who sophisticates the law to his mind by the turn of his own reasoning.

* * * * * * *

A judiciary independent of a king or executive alone is a good thing; an independence of the whole of the Nation is solecism, at least in a republican government. (See also Jefferson's letter to Johnson in connection with his controversy with Marshall, vol. 12, p. 252.)

Strangely enough, the term "sappers" was used to describe not legislative "sappers" but judicial "sappers" in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Was John Randolph also "a pink, a red, or a yellow" in politics when he wrote:

The judges of the Supreme Court and of the courts of the United States shall be removed by the President on the joint address of both Houses of Congress.

Andrew Jackson, when vetoing the bank charter on July 10, 1832, and replying to the point raised by the advocates of the bill, knowing that the Supreme Court had already decided that the bank's charter be constitutional, said:

It is as much the duty of the House of Representatives, of the Senate, and the President to decide upon the constitutionality of any bill or resolution which might be presented to them. The opinion of the judges has no more authority over Congress than the opinion of Congress over the judges; and in that point the President is independent of both.

Indeed, the power of the judiciary to declare unconstitutional a considered act of Congress finds no written basis in our Constitution. The debates of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 contain no reference to any such power. Whatever was said there seems to negative the view that the framers intended to vest such powers in the Supreme Court.

In the Debates in the Federal Convention, fifth volume, page 429, James Madison said:

Mr. Pickney opposed the interference of judges in the legislative business. It will involve them in parties and give a previous tincture to their opinions. Mr. Mercer heartily approved the motion. It is an axiom that the judiciary ought to be separate from the legislative; but equally so it ought to be independent of that department. The true policy of the axiom is that legislative usurpation and oppression may be obviated. He disapproved of the doctrine with the judges as expository of the Constitution should have operated to declare a law void. He thought laws ought to be well and cautiously made, and then be uncontrollable.

On the other hand, those who contended that the power did exist maintained that it was implicit in the Constitution itself, although not expressed. This doctrine first found acceptance in the logic of Chief Justice John Marshall in the case of Marbury against Madison, although even in judicial circles the existence of that power was denied. Witness the able opinion of Mr. Justice Gibson, of Pennsylvania, one of the ablest of judges, afterward chief justice of that State.

That Marshall's view was prompted by Federalist political opinions, there can be no doubt. That politics played a great part in his decision is also without question. Witness the fact that the Democratic Party of those days, fathered by Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe and followed by Andrew Jackson, was bitterly opposed to such judicial encroachment.

Alexander Hamilton and Chief Justice John Marshall fought for the principle of strengthening the National Government.

It is paradoxical that the political quarrels of those days were directed to the strengthening of the Federal power, while today those who believe in the doctrine thus established by John Marshall would use his doctrine to destroy that which they have thus built up with the struggle which culminated in our great Civil War.

No one can now deny the power of the Supreme Court to set at naught an act of Congress which is clearly unconstitutional. However, it is equally well settled that the power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional can only be sparingly exercised and only where the act of Congress is unconstitutional beyond a reasonable doubt.

The spirit of the Constitution is embodied in the phrase of its preamble:

> In order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessing of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity.

Certainly it was never intended by the framers of our Constitution to build a fence around the letter of the Constitution and by judicial interpretation emasculate its spirit. What may have been unconstitutional a century ago cannot be so considered today. In validating city zoning ordinances in the case of Village of Euclid against Rambler Realty Co. even the Supreme Court of the United States had occasion to observe, in effect, that a century ago such city zoning ordinances would have been the taking of property without due process. Today the public safety and health demand that such regulations, although interfering with other reasonable uses of private property, are declared valid and enforceable.

The Bill of Rights of our Constitution and the right to be governed as a democratic republic are the only parts of our Constitution that are sacred and immutable. Everything else must, of necessity, be subject to change, as the framers clearly intended, as is shown by the provisions made for amendments to the Constitution and the offering of the amendments from time to time.

The recent judicial attempts to strike down congressional legislation, having for its object the cure of economic ills and the happiness of the American people, are, however, an encroachment upon the spirit of the American Constitution, which is, and should be, remedied either by the judiciary itself or by an amendment to the Constitution itself.

I am charged with currying favor with the reds, pinks, and yellows for criticizing the Supreme Court.

I am sure that everyone will agree that Theodore Roosevelt was neither a "red", "pink", nor "yellow" when he said in his speech at Carnegie Hall:

> And I contend that the people, in the nature of things, must be better judges of what is preponderate opinion than the courts and that the courts should not be allowed to reverse the political philosophy of the people.

And further, in his annual message to the Sixtieth Congress, second session, 1908, he wrote:

> The chief lawmakers are the judges, because they are the final seat of authority. Every time they interpret vested rights, due process of law, and liberty they necessarily enact into law, parties of a system of social philosophy; and as such interpretation is fundamental, they give direction to all lawmaking. The decisions of the courts on economic and social questions depend on their economic and social philosophy; and for the peaceful progress of our people during the twentieth century, we shall owe much to those judges to hold the twentieth century economic and social philosophies and know changing conditions. Of course, a judge's views on progressive social philosophy are entirely second in importance to his position and of a high and fine character; which means the possession of such virtues as honesty, courage, and fair-minedness.

Was Theodore Roosevelt a "red" when he advocated recall of judicial decisions?

I am charged with seeking to overthrow the Government and the Constitution in making an unjustified attack on the integrity of the Supreme Court. I assume that this conclusion was drawn from my speech of July 23, 1935, in which I said:

> It is indeed unfortunate that many of the judges were corporation lawyers and are capitalistic-minded and cannot forget their political affiliations.

And when I further said:

> The summary to which my colleague has called attention shows that the vast majority of judges who have called our acts unconstitutional are Republicans who cannot divorce themselves from their political affiliations.

Were Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, John Randolph, and other Democrats of that day enemies of our Constitution when they declared that John Marshall, in Marbury against Madison, had written his political opinions into his judicial decisions?

Have we not had numerous decisions on the Supreme Court Bench where politics have influenced judicial action?

Did not Judge Bradley, in the celebrated Hayes-Tilden fight, suddenly change his vote to insure the election of a Republican candidate for the Presidency?

What criticism was made of this, and were those who did so enemies of the constitutional governments, sappers, reds, pinks, or yellows?

Mr. Hearst, in his discussion on a Constitutional Democratic Party, which may be found in his newspapers of August 29, 1935, himself fails to recognize the principles of the historic Democratic Party of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson. These men never recognized the Supreme Court's decision read into the Constitution by judicial legislation that an act of Congress might be declared unenforceable by a court.

It was Jefferson, the fountain of the idealism of the Constitution, who said in a letter to Samuel Kercheval concerning the Constitution on July 12, 1816:

> Some men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence, and deem them, like the Ark of the Covenant, too sacred to be touched. They ascribe to the men of the preceding age a wisdom more than human, and suppose what they did to be beyond amendment. I knew that age well; I belonged to it and labored with it. It deserved well of its country. It was very like the present, but without the experience of the present; and 40 years of experience in government is worth a century of book reading, and this they would say themselves were they to rise from the dead. I am certainly not an advocate for frequent and untried changes in laws and constitutions. I think moderate imperfections had better be borne with, because, when once known, we accommodate ourselves to them and find practical means of correcting their ill effects. But I know also that laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. As that becomes more developed, more enlightened, as new discoveries are made, new truths disclosed, and manners and opinions change with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also and keep pace with the times. We might as well require a man to wear still the coat which fitted him when a boy as civilized society to remain ever under the regimen of their * * * ancestors * * *. Each generation is as independent as the one preceding, as that was of all which had gone before. It has then, like them, a right to choose for itself the form of government it believes most promotive of its own happiness; consequently, to accommodate to the circumstances in which it finds itself, that received from its predecessors; and it is for the peace and good of mankind that a solemn opportunity of doing this * * * should be provided by the Constitution, so that it may be handed on, with periodical repairs, from generation to generation, to the end of time, if anything human can so long endure. * * * This corporeal globe and everything upon it belong to its present corporeal inhabitants during their generation. They alone have a right to direct what is the concern of themselves alone and to declare the law of that direction. * * * If this avenue be shut to the call of sufferance, it will make itself heard through that of force, and we shall go on, as other nations are going, in the endless circle of oppression, rebellion, reformation, and oppression, rebellion, reformation again, and so on, forever.

Next let me quote that rugged Democrat of the old school, Andrew Jackson. In vetoing an act of Congress Jackson said:

> If the opinion of the Supreme Court covered the whole ground of this act, it ought not to control the coordinate authorities of this Government. The Congress, the Executive, and the Court must, each for itself, be guided by its own opinion of the Constitution. Each public officer who takes an oath to support the Constitution swears that he will support it as he understands it and not as it is understood by others.

So favorably did Lincoln consider this quotation by Jackson that he, Lincoln, used it in justifying his stand on the Dred Scott decision.

Again, Lincoln said in his debate with Douglas concerning the Dred Scott decision:

We believe as much as Judge Douglas (perhaps more) in obedience to and respect for the judicial department of Government. We think its decision on constitutional questions, when fully settled, should control not only the particular cases decided but the general policy of the country, subject to be disturbed only by amendments of the Constitution as provided in that instrument itself. More than this would be revolution. But we think the Dred Scott decision is erroneous. We know the Court that made it has often overruled its own decisions, and we shall do what we can to have it overrule this.

The last refuge of the scoundrel in these days is not only an appeal to patriotism but the platform of the Constitution.

I am no "red, pink, or yellow." I am just a good old-fashioned Democrat, imbued with the principles of Jefferson, Jackson, Wilson, and Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and I hold with Prof. Edward S. Corwin, of Princeton University, when he says in his brochure Twilight of the Supreme Court, at page 184:

"Back to the Constitution?" Yes; if what is intended is "the Constitution" concerning which the Court has asserted, "It was made for an undefined and expanding future." No; if what is meant is certain doctrines, also sanctioned by the Court at times, which were conceived with the idea in mind of putting the future in cold storage. Fortunately, or unfortunately, the few declined to be thus refrigerated. The present-day economic and social conditions the doctrines alluded to have little if any relevance for a community which intends to remain democratic; and if "relations must dominate the judgment", as the Court has said they must, the outlook for such doctrines is not bright. "Back to the Constitution?" The first requirement of the constitution of a progressive society is that it keep pace with that society.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULES

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule 16, for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 9215) making appropriations to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, the following amendment, viz: At end of bill add a new section reading as follows:

"The Commodity Credit Corporation is hereby directed to make loans to farmers at the rate of 12 cents per pound on cotton, when such loans are secured by cotton stored in warehouses approved by said Corporation, upon such terms and conditions as similar loans have been made by said Corporation during the crop year ending July 31, 1935, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby directed to make available to the Commodity Credit Corporation sufficient funds to carry out this purpose."

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULES

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule 16 for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 9215) making appropriations to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, the following amendment, viz: At the ending of the bill insert the following:

"No part of any funds made available for the use of the Commodity Credit Corporation either from the Treasury directly or through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be paid to any person, firm, corporation, or cooperative association for services in connection with the removal of cotton under what is known as the 'reconcentration program' from any warehouse heretofore approved by said Commodity Credit Corporation, nor shall any such funds be expended for storage of any cotton moved under such program from the place of original storage."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9100) to stabilize the bituminous coal-mining industry and promote its interstate commerce; to provide for cooperative marketing of bituminous coal; to levy a tax on bituminous coal and provide for a drawback under certain conditions; to declare the production, distribution, and use of bituminous coal to be affected with a national public interest; to conserve the bituminous coal resources of the United States; to provide for the general welfare, and for other purposes; and providing penalties, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL, Mr. LEWIS of Maryland, Mr. VINSON of Kentucky, Mr. KNUTSON, and Mr. REED of New York were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2652) to authorize the President to attach certain possessions of the United States to internal-revenue collection districts for the purpose of collecting processing taxes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9074) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, etc., and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependents of such soldiers and sailors, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 9074) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, etc., and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependents of such soldiers and sailors, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

LEGISLATION OF PRESENT SESSION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR ROBINSON

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, last evening the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the distinguished majority leader, under the auspices of the Star Radio Forum, National Broadcasting Co., Nation-wide network, delivered a speech on legislation enacted during the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress. It is an able and illuminating speech. I wish to commend it to the careful reading of all Senators and all readers of the RECORD; and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGISLATION ENACTED DURING THE FIRST SESSION, SEVENTY-FOURTH CONGRESS

Near the close of one of the longest sessions of Congress ever held, it may be truly said that the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress justified its prolongation by passing legislation the quality of which is comparable to the greatest measures enacted in the history of our Government.

I daresay many people who have followed the newspaper accounts of the proceedings understand the importance of the legislation of this session. Some of the newspaper headlines have related to the differences expressed as to legislation, but the Congress, in the main, has actually been a harmonious, hard-working body engaged in threshing out differences to the end that wise and necessary laws be enacted.

The partisan newspapers have stressed wrangles. That is quite natural, for there is drama in a struggle and no drama at all in the ordinary routine of legislation. Men of principle will fight for their convictions, and in the earnestness of debate sharp things are said. Also, to some extent, politics enters into the motives and movements of Congressmen. That is not so bad as it sounds, for it sharpens criticism of bills and refines the final measures.

Legislation frequently is suggested by the President as the Constitution contemplates. Administration sources very naturally find the need for legislation from experience in administering prior laws. Every one of the measures disposed of has been debated, analyzed, and, I believe, improved.

SOCIAL SECURITY

If the session soon ending had done nothing but enact the Social Security Act, it would have qualified itself for a place among memorable Congresses. This measure represents progress. Old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, and definite recognition of the obligations to take care of such unfortunates as crippled children, the blind, and indigent mothers, are some of the features of this new law. The bill creates a Federal-State unemployment compensation; it provides that after September 1, 1936, employers will be assessed excise taxes on their pay rolls of 1 percent next year, 2 percent the year following, and 3 percent thereafter. The funds will be paid according to laws adopted by the States. The bill allows a credit up to 90 percent to employers on account of taxes paid to particular State unemployment funds, and grants a Federal subsidy of $4,000,000 in 1936 and $49,000,000 annually thereafter to assist the States. The bill authorizes $24,750,000 to assist the States in aid to dependent children; grants are to be made of one-third by the Federal Government and two-thirds by the States with the Federal allowance limited to $6 to a child and $4 to any other child in the same household. Three million eight hundred thousand dollars a year is the Federal Government's contribution for the health of mothers and children, especially in rural areas, and $2,850,000 a year is granted in providing surgical and other facilities for crippled children. The Nation will grant $8,000,000 to assist the States in general health service and $3,000,000 on a 50-50 basis for pensioning the needy blind. There are, of course, other grants and provisions, but the most important of them is a cash benefit to people over 65 years old, based on the total amount of wages received before the beneficiary attained the retirement age. The Treasury is to be reimbursed for these grants by a tax upon both employers and employees based upon the latter's wages. Unemployment insurance is part of the program, the rate of pay being based on the average monthly salary contingent and varying according to the years of employment. Every effort is made in those provisions to guard against favoritism. The Social Security Board will be composed of 3 members, not more than 2 of whom to belong to the same political party, and the terms of office will be 6 years, in order that periodical appointments shall not coincide with any Presidential term.

The general recognition of the necessity for such a measure was indicated by the vote of the Congress. The House passed it 10 to 1, and there were only 6 votes against its passage in the Senate.

BENEFITS TO VETERANS

There seems to be a general impression that all the soldier legislation enacted was the soldier bonus bill, which was vetoed by the President, the veto being sustained by the Senate. Actually there were a number of measures in aid of the ex-soldiers. For example, World War veterans have been restored to former rates of compensation for disabilities incurred during service and 75 percent of the former rates for those whose disabilities are described as presumptive, meaning that, while it cannot be established, their disabilities are presumed to have resulted from their period in the Army. Civil War veterans and their dependents are aided by a restoration of 5 percent. Spanish-American War veterans and their dependents benefited by a complete restoration of pensions at an increased cost of about $45,000,000. New hospitals and additions to existing veterans hospitals are taken care of by the appropriation of $21,000,000, and free hospitalization is extended to peace-time veterans who are on the pension rolls.

Another bill extends the period during which claims for adjusted compensation may be filed to January 2, 1940, giving opportunity to every soldier to obtain what he is entitled to when this adjusted compensation falls due.

In addition, an arrangement has been effected to have the Finance Committee consider and report a measure relating to the payment of adjusted-compensation certificates by the 15th of January next and to proceed to the consideration and disposition of the bill during the session which begins January 3, 1936.

EMERGENCY RELIEF

In the early part of this session more attention was paid to the $4,000,000,000 work-relief appropriation than to any other measure that came before the Congress. The purpose of this huge sum, the expenditure of which was left in the President's hands, was the elimination of the dole. The theory is, and the practice should be, that no person capable of working is to receive Government alms. Experience had shown that the dole system was breaking the morale of many, and in certain sections of the country there were instances of people being content to live on the Federal bounty rather than to accept work, even though the wages were higher than the dole. There was even controversy about the rate of pay. Some people thought that Government work under this appropriation should pay the same wages as any other work. The answer to this was that it would require much more than the sum appropriated to meet the pay rolls, and we could never get rid of the relief workers. So the program was adopted making the pay larger than the dole but smaller than the prevailing rate. The obvious purpose of this was to insure that nobody would stay on work relief who could get a private job. That program is under way, and already its effects are visible in the diminution of the emergency relief rolls. Ultimately there will be left on the list of those getting direct relief merely the unemployables. The care of them will revert to their States. Meanwhile the $4,000,000,000 will go into public works, C. C. C. camps, highways, roads, streets, and railway crossings, and various other enterprises that will put men to work and contribute to public improvement. Nine hundred million dollars is set aside for loans and grants to the States to carry on their own projects, it being specifically provided that of the allotments under this heading, 25 percent of the Federal grant must be expended for labor.

There was $800,000,000 still unused from last year's appropriation. This was lumped in with the rest, so in all there is due to be spent nearly $5,000,000,000 to get people off the relief rolls and into employment which, while not paying enough to put them into competition with the labor in private enterprises, will pay wages sufficient to keep going those who would otherwise have no jobs until the superior pay of private employment takes them out of the Government service.

BANKING ACT OF 1935

This was one of the measures about which there was considerable controversy between those who sought to have closer Government control of the Federal Reserve System and those who sought to diminish the Government's part. There was finally enacted a compromise between these two groups. The board of governors of the Federal Reserve System is to be made up of seven members, appointed by the President. After February 1, 1936, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, who have heretofore functioned, will be eliminated from membership. There is provided a Federal open-market committee, having charge of open-market operations, and the Reserve banks will act in accordance with its instructions. This committee is composed of the board of governors and five members to be elected by the Federal Reserve banks. It is also provided that purchases of obligations must be made in the open market. The measure places a curb on the use of funds for speculative purposes by making it more difficult for member banks to alter reserve requirements on deposits. Reserve banks are required to restate their discount rates every 10 days, subject to the approval of the Board. National banks are permitted to make real-estate loans up to 50 percent of the appraised value of the security offered for a term of 5 years, except in cases of amortized loans, when 60 percent may be loaned for a 10-year term. The measure broadens the eligibility requirements of paper upon which the Reserve banks may make loans. It provides that officers, directors, and employees of a Reserve member bank may serve in a similar capacity in one other bank if approved by the Reserve bank governors. It requires all State banks with deposits of $1,000,000 or more to join the Federal Reserve System by 1942 in order to have their deposits insured, and provides for the permanent insurance of bank deposits up to $5,000 per individual account. It limits dealings in securities to purchases and sales upon order and for the account of customers and prohibits associations from underwriting any issue of securities. It permits associations to purchase securities for their own account, subject to limitations and restrictions by the Comptroller of the Currency, and provides that the total amount of the securities of one issuer or obligor held by an association for its own account shall not exceed 10 percent of the actually paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus fund, except that this provision shall not apply to lawful holdings as of the date this legislation is enacted.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT

This act, generally known as the "Wagner Labor Disputes Law", is perhaps the most important bill from the point of view of organized labor that has come before the Congress. In brief, it creates the National Labor Relations Board, consisting of three members appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. States' employees have the right to self-organization, to bargain collectively, and to join or assist labor unions. It classifies as unfair labor practice any effort on the part of an employer to interfere with employees in the exercise of their guaranteed rights to dominate any labor organization, or discriminate in regard to employment so as to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization; to discriminate against any employee for filing charges or giving testimony under this act; or to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees. It provides for employee representatives and their election, and empowers the Board to prevent any unfair labor practice and vests the Board with investigatory powers.

This measure really carries out one of the elements of the N. R. A. program, which was vitiated by the Supreme Court's decision. It might be just as well for me at this point to tell you something about the constitutional controversy in regard to some of the recent legislation. The effort has been made, of course, to comply with the restrictions embraced in the Supreme Court's decision. There is nothing novel about the questioning of the constitutionality of pending legislation. Very frequently in the past the question has been raised, and not infrequently the Supreme Court has found it necessary to rule against acts of Congress that were signed by a President. For example, the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional seven different laws signed by President Harding. Even President Coolidge, who has come to typify extreme caution in the American mind, fared no better than his predecessor, for the Supreme Court declared invalid laws signed by him. During the relatively somnolent term of President Hoover, the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional three measures regularly enacted and signed by the President. Precedent has determined that it is the function of the judicial branch of the Government to pass on the validity of all laws, and while Congress never knowingly enacts a measure that contravenes the known opinion of the Court, it must, in advance of such an opinion, accept the judgment of its own legal authorities.

Since the founding of the Government there have been 33 strictly Democratic Congresses and 27 Republican Congresses. The others were a mixture of Democratic House and Republican Senates, or Republican Houses and Democratic Senates. During the time of the strictly partisan bodies, the Democrats passed 20 acts declared unconstitutional and the Republicans 42. Therefore, you find that the Republicans have passed 70 percent of the acts declared unconstitutional and the Democrats 30 percent. Twelve of these unconstitutional acts were passed under the administration of the Republican President and popular war hero, General Grant. So why all the constitutional partisan furore?

BUS AND TRUCK REGULATION

The Seventy-fourth Congress also, for the first time, brought under Federal control the busses and motor trucks that so suddenly became an element in our transportation system. The railroads complained that whereas they were under strict control by the Interstate Commerce Commission, that while they have to pay for rights-of-way and maintenance of their roadbeds, this new competition was exempt from all these restrictions; that busses and motor trucks use the public highways without tax or charge, make rates to suit themselves, effect mergers or institute competition just as they please. There is, of course, the other side to the story, the argument of the bus and truck companies that they perform a service the railroads cannot perform, for they gather their passengers and freight wherever they happen to be and deliver them to the doors of their homes or their places of business. Out of the controversy has come this new law, which provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall regulate these services and see to it that they supply adequate service and insure safety of operations and equipment. The bill leaves out of such control specific vehicles, such as those used exclusively in carrying livestock, fish, or agricultural commodities, or in the distribution of newspapers, or those which are used and controlled and operated by farm cooperative associations.

The legislation that has been enacted is, of course, only a tithe of the output of the session that began with the new year. Such important measures as the public-utilities bill, seeking control of the holding companies; the tax bill, raising surtaxes in the higher brackets and increasing the tax on large estates; repeal of the "pink slip" provision of income-tax returns; and several others are still passing through the legislative hopper. The Guffey coal bill, designed to keep economic peace in the soft-coal fields, only passed the House a day or two ago. We have passed laws affecting mines and minerals, railroad transportation, extending deposit insurance, protecting wildlife and game. We have added to the farm-credit law, providing for loans to farms for crop production and harvesting; declared a policy in regard to soil erosion; amended the Home Mortgage Financing Act; amended the Farm Mortgage Act, benefiting the tenant farmers and share croppers; regulated petroleum shipments; reenacted railroad retirement legislation that is now confidently believed will stand the test of Supreme Court decision, that will give employees who are 65 years of age and who have completed 30 years of service the opportunity to retire. While legislation was passed at the last session singling our benefits to the cotton producers, we have also enacted legislation benefiting tobacco growers along with other agricultural products. The bill amending the Agricultural Adjustment Act is among the most important passed. In short, the session just closing has performed an enormous amount of necessary work.

There was little excitement, there was little publicity to most of these bills, though each of them represents necessary improvements in our statute books.

It may perhaps give you an idea of how Congress kept busy 7 months when I tell you that there were presented in the House of Representatives 10,000 bills and resolutions and in the Senate nearly 4,000. During the same period there were considered nearly 15,000 nominations.

Much of the legislation, of course, is supplementary to the laws passed in the session last year. As experience developed weaknesses in the structure of these laws, the errors were corrected. The rulings of the Supreme Court, of course, compelled more legislation aimed to bring the ordinances in conformity with that tribunal's decisions.

It is now possible to take a comprehensive view of the new deal to estimate what the advent of President Roosevelt has meant to our country. Cast your mind back to where we were in March 1933, when he arrived in Washington. Promptly on his inauguration Congress plunged into the banking situation. From then on he pursued a policy designed to help everybody in the Republic. It rescued the farmers from despair; it put millions of men back to work; it lighted the furnaces of thousands of mills and factories that had been cold for years; it brought the income of our people up by billions of dollars annually. These are not fancied figures; they are based on the income-tax reports made by our citizens themselves.

Sufficient time is not available to permit a fuller review of the subjects which have engaged the attention of the Congress during the session that is closing. There have been enacted many laws which there is no opportunity now to outline and discuss, and some of them are of notable consequence. We have labored diligently and earnestly with the single purpose of advancing the public welfare.

I do not say that mistakes have not been made. In a program of such magnitude errors are inevitable, but how small and trifling these seem in comparison with the result. This administration is being subjected to intense criticism, which is understandable considering the approach of next year's election. Our President has been charged with everything from communism to despotism, and yet you cannot pick up a daily paper that does not reflect a rise in the stock market, an increase in profits, a resumption of dividends; in fact, every manifestation that tells of a country bound back to prosperity. Criticism is often made, but it is usually without one word of constructive suggestion, one idea of a substitute program. I am proud of the record made by the Congress, proud of the part it has played in the accomplishment that has brought us so far toward contentment. It is my belief that when history writes its review of the legislation of this Congress it will be made clear that the laws enacted at this session were for the greatest good to the greatest number.

RECORD OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY—ADDRESS BY SENATOR DUFFY

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able speech delivered this morning by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] at the convention of Young Democrats in Milwaukee.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I want you to know, my young Democratic friends, how sincerely grateful I am for this opportunity to greet you and to welcome this convention to the great State of Wisconsin.

As the only Democratic Senator from this State, and as a proud member of the National Democratic administration, I am personally greatly pleased that you have honored our State by holding your convention in our largest city. I hope it will be so successful in every respect that hereafter it may be known as the convention that "made Milwaukee famous."

Permit me, first, to congratulate you upon your fine interest in matters pertaining to government. In times gone by it was a fair criticism to say that too many of our good citizens gave practically no consideration or study to the complicated processes by which we, as citizens of a Republic, are governed. But, several years ago, when our Government was reeling and staggering from the repeated blows of a great depression, our citizens began to awaken. And so most of us now realize that we live not for today alone. Our consideration and study must be of the morrow.

The youth of today have the most at stake. Their span of life is longer; they should, of course, be greatly concerned for the future.

Your interest in politics shows your interest in matters of government. In a Government such as ours the will of the people is expressed through political parties. I congratulate you upon your interest in and devotion to the oldest and most representative of all American political parties.

Any party that does not attract to itself the youth of the land in large numbers would soon die of dry rot. It augurs well for the Democratic Party that young men and young women in every part of this country are enthusiastically espousing the cause of Democracy, and are becoming active and energetic workers in your organization.

You have every reason to be proud of your party. Its record of accomplishments is such as to send a thrill of pride through every patriotic American. You didn't hear criticism 2 years ago, when the very existence of our kind of government seemed to be in the balance. But conditions are so much better now, and a campaign is just around the corner—and now that the Democratic administration has the ship of state sailing along on even keel again—the cries of those outside looking in will become louder and louder.

We all know that there are differences of opinion as to the precautions that should be taken in times of epidemic. There are divergent views as to regulations of quarantine. In fact, it all depends upon whose baby has the measles.

You recently read a statement from the former President of the United States, expressing his horror and distress with reference to policies which have to do with the new deal. He was apparently shocked at what he described as "the demands made upon and the surrender by Congress to the President of powers reaching to dictatorial dimensions and the invasion of State rights." His views were not always thus, for I note in 1924, when he, as Secretary of Commerce, appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives (which had under consideration a bill concerning policies that should be pursued in wartime), Mr. Herbert Hoover said, "I would also suggest that from a legal point of view a general clause should be added to the bill giving blanket authority to the President to fix prices, wages, transportation charges, compensations, embargoes on imports and exports."

And yet, in his statement the other day, he said that the doing of things that were not nearly so extreme meant "for 2 years primary liberties of the people have been trampled upon."

This gentleman, whose recent utterance was accepted by his own party as expressing a willingness and desire to be our future President, is horrified to see such power placed in the hands of President Roosevelt as has been conferred by this and the preceding Congress. And yet, in April 1924, Mr. Hoover in his formal written statement to the Military Affairs Committee of the House, expressed his philosophy in this way, "It seems to me that for all administrative functions, war especially requires single-headed responsibility. Men must make instant decisions and take instant responsibility."

This ex-President, who apparently is again a candidate for office, pretends to be greatly exercised by Government interference and regimentation of business.

Let me quote this gentleman's testimony before the Military Affairs Committee: "The right to fix prices", he said in reply to a question, "instantly war is entered upon, and to requisition materials under the war power, would be a considerable shock to any pre-war speculator."

But, some of you undoubtedly are thinking that the ex-President, in his arguments for concentrating all authority in the Presidency, had in mind a major war, and not a condition growing out of an economic depression. What I am presenting to you is Mr. Hoover's own philosophy! He had always regarded the depression as a war. He discussed it in war terms all through the 1932 campaign. For example, in a speech at Des Moines on October 4, 1932, he said, "We have fought an unending war against the effect of these calamities upon our people. This is no time to recount the battles on a thousand fronts." In Detroit, 10 days later, he said, "I can understand that part of this weariness comes from the exhaustion of a long battle, but in the battle we have carried the front-line trenches." In fact, Mr. Hoover definitely pronounced the economic situation as a greater crisis than war.

The other day when Mr. Hoover was getting a degree from some university, he said his chief fear just now was "What the forces of Government may impose on you that may limit and destroy your inspirations, your incentives, and your opportunities."

So, you see, my friends, it is just a question of whose baby has the measles.

The Military Affairs Committee of the House was considering what was necessary to take care of a great national emergency. Five years had elapsed since the conclusion of a great war, and the question centered on the legality and advisability of conferring supreme powers on the Chief Executive for the effective handling of an emergency problem.

To more thoroughly understand Mr. Hoover's philosophy, let me quote in full a paragraph of his written statement to the Military Affairs Committee, an excerpt from which I have already presented. He said, "I would also suggest that from a legal point of view a general clause should be added to the bill giving a blanket authority to the President to fix prices, wages, transportation charges, compensations, embargoes on imports and exports, to exercise the war powers of requisition under circumstances that 75 percent of the estimated value may be paid and the balance determined by the courts in case of disagreement; suspend habeas corpus and generally complete an absolute authority in all ramifications over the whole civilian life with the provision that he may delegate these authorities through the various agencies."

These were Mr. Hoover's views as something necessary in the event of the United States ever being involved in a war. We have his own word for it that the depression constituted an even greater emergency than an international struggle, for in his final speech in the 1932 campaign, addressed to the people of California, which speech was carried over the radio, he said, "No more serious moment has ever brought the people of California and myself together in counsel as friends and neighbors than that which challenges us now. California has been honored by the Nation with its leadership during a period even more dangerous than a great war."

And so, 10 years ago when his party was in power and when he expected to be Mr. Coolidge's successor to the Presidency, he was all for giving the President unlimited power in an emergency. It was not a question with him merely of the institution of codes for business or the limitation of crops in order to bring about living prices for the farmer's products; it was not merely a matter of getting industries to agree to a living wage and a limitation of the hours of labor in order that more people might be employed; it was not merely the question of abolishing child labor and sweat-shop conditions; but Mr. Hoover was asking for the absolute suspension of even such guarantees of liberty as the writ of habaes corpus. He was asking an unlimited despotic power in a time of a national emergency. During his term as President there was nothing he did to indicate a change in his philosophy; and on the eve of the election, which set him out of the White House, he announced that the then emergency was a greater peril than a great war.

But that was in 1932, and now toward the end of 1935, when he again is a candidate for the Presidency, he tells the people that the policies of the Democratic administration, mild as they are in comparison with what he advocated in an emergency, are unconstitutional and dictatorial and a threat to liberty and prosperity.

Yes, my friends, it all depends on whose baby has the measles.

Young Democrats, since March 4, 1933, this Nation has had an inspired leadership. A great humane program of recovery has been successfully undertaken. We can all be justly proud of the accomplishments of our administration.

I need not recount to you the condition of our country just prior to March 4, 1933. I'm sure the people of America have not forgotten, even though our Republican friends will try to make them do so. We were then face to face with a great crisis. The crushing weight of the depression caused our people to become hysterical with fear and doubt. But a new leader had been chosen by a majority of many millions to direct and carry on the battle against depression. Our people cried out for action. They wanted an end to the aimless policy of drifting.

You recall the great message that went out from our new leader. He promised action. He took our people into his confidence. He was frank enough to predict that he wouldn't make a hit every time he came to bat. I claim that, in batting average, he leads in all leagues.

Of our critical Republican friends I ask not only what they would have done but, in addition, I challenge them to say which of the major legislative acts of this administration they would now erase from the statute books.

The first step on the program was the banking moratorium legislation. I have heard no one complain, but, on the contrary, friends and foes alike have conceded that this step was absolutely necessary to preserve the banking institutions of this country, and millions of depositors are indeed grateful because of this wise, courageous step.

Do the critics complain of the Home Owners' Loan Act which refinanced mortgages on 889,000 modest homes owned by our good citizens who were in financial distress? Had this act not been passed nearly a million would have been dispossessed and thrown out on the streets, discouraged and hopeless. Although these loans totaled almost $3,000,000,000, in the long run there will be practically no expense to the Government. The same is true with reference to the Farm Credit Act. Over 1,000,000 farm families have had their farm homes saved for them, refinanced on a lower rate of interest, and again, although the total amount of loans was slightly under $3,000,000,000, worked out over a period of years, there will be practically no expense to our Government. Over $100,000,000 of these home loans have been completed in Wisconsin, and approximately $125,000,000 of farm loans have been refinanced in the State.

Who of the critics will complain about the great Civilian Conservation Corps program which has taken so many of the young men off the streets of our cities and put them at healthful work which will mean so much to the future of our Nation? I doubt if any critic would have the temerity to complain about that great, humane, character-building program.

And what do the farmers of America think about our administration? Our Republican friends have always thought a great deal about the farmers during campaign years, and then have proceeded promptly to forget about them until the next campaign rolled around. From the end of the Wilson administration in March 1921, until the beginning of the Roosevelt administration in 1933, agriculture in this country was on the downward path, and at the end of that period was prostrate. Do the critics think that they can fool the American farmer with their sneers at the Agricultural Adjustment Act? Do they think that the American farmer can be made to forget? Farmers of America, last year, received more than $2,000,000,000 greater income for their products than in the last year under the Hoover administration. Prices of all farm products have gone up on an average of more than 100 percent while the things which the farmer must buy have not increased in price to nearly that extent. The farmer will not forget that he was getting 23 cents a bushel for his corn in January 1933, instead of the 80 cents he receives today. He will not forget that he received 43 cents a bushel for his wheat, whereas today it sells for around 96 cents a bushel. He will not forget that butter sold then for around 18 cents a pound, and today it is approximately 29 cents a pound, and so on, through the list of the farm products.

And do any of the critics have nerve enough to criticize the act whereby the deposits in our banks are now insured by the Federal Government on deposits up to $5,000? Ninety-eight percent of the bank deposits are for less than $5,000. Do the Republicans criticize this act now? Listen to what the Republican Senator, Mr. VANDENBERG, from Michigan, recently said: "From my observation, I think I have never seen a difficult and perplexing public responsibility more ably discharged than during the 18 months of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, presided over by Mr. Crowley." We in Wisconsin are proud that Mr. Crowley is a citizen of our great State.

And who is there who will criticize the Federal Housing Act, and the great work that has been done in financing the construction of new homes and other new building projects? Seventy-one percent of the new building construction in Milwaukee this past year has been financed through the F. H. A.

And so on, down through the list, although mistakes may have been made here and there, who is there who will stand before the American people and say that the major parts of the program have not been sound and necessary? Most of these measures were supported on final passage by Republican Senators and Representatives, because the measures had so much inherent good and merit that those representatives of the people dared not oppose them with their vote.

On last Monday we passed the Labor Railroad Retirement Act in the Senate, and there were only three Republican Senators who voted against it. When we passed the Social Security Act, providing old-age pensions and workmen's unemployment insurance, as I recollect, there were only six Senators who voted against it. And so on, through the list, it will be well to keep in mind during the next campaign when the Democratic national administration is being criticized by those who would like to get into office, that in a large measure the Republican Senators and Republican Representatives supported these various measures when they came to a final vote.

Again I congratulate you young men and women for your interest and activity in a program that will bring so much of happiness and contentment in the future to the people of this great Nation.

I only regret that the Chief Executive, the commanding general in this battle against depression, was not able to personally appear here before you as he had intended to do. I know that the President would have been greatly pleased to have appeared before you personally. Shortly before leaving Washington I had the opportunity of visiting with him, and when he found it would be impossible for him to personally attend he wrote out this note of greeting for me to bring to you:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 19, 1935.

DEAR RYAN: Please convey my best wishes to the Young Democrats' Convention and say to those present that I had hoped up to the last minute to be able to visit Milwaukee with them. The simple truth is that the pressure of public business, resulting largely from the approaching adjournment of the Congress, makes it impossible for me to leave Washington at this time.

While circumstances combine to keep me here in Washington, it is with some degree of satisfaction that I find it will be possible for me to address the convention over the radio. Arrangements have been completed for me to speak from the White House study Saturday evening at 9:30, Washington time.

I fully realize and appreciate the significance of the Young Democrats' gathering in Milwaukee. Youth is the period of progress through action, and I shall be mindful Saturday night as I talk to them that they are firm in the faith that the purpose of government must ever be the welfare of all the people.

I am grateful to you for this service.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Hon. F. RYAN DUFFY,
United States Senator, Milwaukee, Wis.

When the President speaks to you tomorrow evening by radio, I know you will listen to a most inspiring message. I feel very certain that after hearing that message and after having concluded the deliberations of this convention, you will go back to your homes in the various parts of the country with renewed inspiration to fight for and carry on with the great cause. With your youth and with your enthusiasm, you can do much to tell the true story to our people, because it is very certain that the selfish interests in the country, who no longer have a favored place in controlling the activities of this Government, will do all in their power to mislead and to deceive our fellow citizens.

Carry on, Young Democrats! Assist our great leader in the fight he is making for all our people.

WHEAT CROP IN THE NORTHWEST—LETTER FROM KNUD WEFALD

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter which I received from former Congressman Wefald, now a member of the Minnesota Railroad and Warehouse Commission, in regard to the light-weight wheat which is produced in the Northwest this year.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINNESOTA RAILROAD AND WAREHOUSE COMMISSION,
St. Paul, August 19, 1935.

Senator LYNN J. FRAZIER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I received your letter of August 5, 1935, reading as follows:

"I am receiving complaints from North Dakota that the low-weight wheat, because of rust, is being closely discriminated against and that there is an abnormally wide spread between the heavy wheat and that of low weight. Under the Minnesota State gradings there is provision for tests for protein content, and if this low-weight wheat is high in protein the fact should be given a good deal of publicity that farmers would demand better prices from the local buyers.

"I wish you would look into this matter and see if the farmers who have the wheat affected by rust cannot get a fair price for it."

To your letter I made reply by wire under date of August 8 to the effect that the Minnesota commission had already on its own initiative begun an investigation of the status of low-weight wheat in the terminal markets.

The Minneapolis Tribune, under date of August 6, carried a story from Washington, D. C., to the effect that you were interested in the situation of low-weight wheat; that you have complaints coming to you from the State of North Dakota expressing fear that low-grade wheat would be unduly discriminated against in the terminals. The article further stated that you had appealed to the Department of Agriculture, the North Dakota State mill, and the Minnesota Railroad and Warehouse Commission for a revision of grading rules to permit the marketing of low-weight wheat by protein content rather than weight.

The article further states:

"Spurred by a telegram from the Farmers' Elevator Co., of Williston, FRAZIER expressed fear that milling companies would pay feed prices for the light wheat, despite tests which he said had proven this wheat just as good for milling as the heavy."

At the outset of this discussion I may reiterate what I stated in my telegram to you that protein tests have been made in Minnesota continuously since 1925, and are now being made. We are facing a situation in the Northwest in regard to light-weight wheat this fall that we have faced on only two different occasions in the past. The first one occurred in the year 1904, of which situation at that time I have comparatively little personal knowledge, and I do not suppose that you have. The situation in 1916 I think both you and I yet have vividly in mind.

Based upon the investigation that we have carried on here, and we have gone to considerable labor and trouble in doing so, the situation this year is quite analogous with the situation in 1916. People familiar with the situation in 1904 say that the situation at this time more closely resembles the situation in that year, with the one difference that there was more heavy wheat in 1904 than there is this year. I also understand that in 1904 there was much more heavy wheat carried over from the previous year. Also, in the year 1916 there was quite a carry-over from the year 1915. At this time there is no carry-over of heavy wheat to speak of.

The light-weight wheat in the Northwest this year was hurt by two different factors, one being excessive heat, and the other an extreme excessive attack of black rust. In some parts of our territory the wheat was hurt mainly by excessive heat; other parts mainly by the black rust. In some parts of the territory it was hurt by both of these factors. I understand that millers and grain men are studying the situation very closely as to the milling quality of all wheat brought to our terminal markets. From sales reports it seems to be indicated that wheat hurt by excessive heat only is considered to be of a better milling quality usually than wheat which has been hurt by black rust or by both heat and black rust. A perusal of sales made on the Minneapolis market yesterday develops the fact that within the range of light-weight wheat on different carloads of wheat having practically the same test weight the price has varied from 7 to 11 cents. At the present time wheat from Montana is bringing a better price than wheat from Minnesota and North Dakota, and wheat from South Dakota is also bringing a somewhat better price than wheat from North Dakota and Minnesota. The claim is made that the difference in price is due to the difference in the milling quality of the wheat.

Since 1916 many different varieties of wheat have been brought out by the different experimental stations, all, or many, of which were claimed to be rust-resistant. The experience with this year's crop has proven that such claim made for practically all of these varieties has been unfounded. In fact, there is said to be only one rust-resistant quality, i. e., the marquillo, which has seemed to have stood up better against the rust than any other variety, but this grade of wheat is again said not to be one of the high milling quality and selling at a discount.

There is considerable difference between the situation now and that of 1916 when Dr. Ladd undertook his milling tests with wheat. At that time it became very far-reaching. Before his experiments were made the question of protein had not attained the same prominence relative to milling qualities of wheat as it has since that time.

We have had our State mill here in Minnesota, which was established for the purpose of making tests and checking on the millers, which came into operation in 1920, and which was ordered established by the Minnesota Legislature in 1919, checking into this matter, and the protein tests in the Minnesota inspection office show a relatively high protein content in the low-weight wheats this year. Samples have been known to run as high as around 20 percent. Since the time that Dr. Ladd made his great disclosure about the protein content in wheat everybody out here in the Northwest has been led to believe that in the making of flour that was the greatest factor of all. Many and many an orator making political speeches and elaborating upon the grandeur of the Northwest has told his listeners time and again the story, which often has been so interpreted, that without this hard spring wheat of the Northwest it would be almost impossible to make decent flour. It seems, however, that protein is, of course, not the only factor; and the peculiar thing about the protein in our 1935 light-weight wheat crop is that most of the protein is contained in the bran, and that bran as a byproduct on the market this year will be of such excessive portions, or percentage, as has not been known to exist in any previous crop year.

So the situation in the milling business this year is that wheat containing the highest percentage of protein content will not sell for anywhere near the same figure that wheat of a much lower protein content, which again contains the other flour-making properties.

In lightweight wheat affected by rust the buyer gives consideration to the quality of gluten and the excessive percentage of ash and moisture that such wheat may contain.

In 1916 the war was on in Europe, and it was necessary to reserve the food resources of this Nation, which demanded the largest possible extraction of flour from the wheat crop, and for that reason more of the lightweight wheat could be used at that time, and at that time the quality of both the gluten and the protein were considerably better than at the present time, and in a more proper relationship to each other, and those qualities in the lightweight wheat at that time really added strength to the heavy wheat.

At that time there were also left in Minnesota many mills in the small towns, which, after Dr. Ladd's disclosures, enjoyed a great increase in their flour-milling business, who were at that time to some extent competitors of the larger mills, and, in these smaller mills, there was quite an outlet for the lighter weight wheat. At that time farmers from a wide radius around such mills took their grist to these mills and had their own flour milled, which, while it did not have the color and appearance of the high-grade patents, was just as nutritious, if not more so, than the highly finished patented flour products. These small mills are, most of them, now a thing of the past.

Another factor that is entering heavily into the situation at this time is the tremendous increase in the volume of the big bakeries. Housewives have now practically ceased to bake bread in their homes, and the Bakers' Trusts are now largely in control of the bread market, and these demand a certain grade of flour which the mills furnish, and some of these big bakeries at the present time also control some of the mills.

This is just a plain statement of facts, as I understand them to be, the correctness or incorrectness of which you may be able to verify from the Department of Agriculture.

We are told that the machinery of the big mills is so constructed now that only a certain portion of the lightweight wheat can be run with the other heavier weight wheat. The system of milling has become so intricate and so delicate, and based on the production of flour from wheat such as is always obtained in any ordinary crop year, I am told that the installation of machinery that would now properly take care of the lightweight wheat with the ordinary weight of wheat would almost necessitate a revolution of the milling system.

Our State mill, which is under very able management by a man of 25 years' milling experience, and who knows the milling game from A to Z, has made quite an extensive test as to the milling value of low-grade wheat. A copy of his findings on the sample submitted is herewith presented. The Minnesota State mill on the basis of an analysis of 1934 wheat for percentage of flour gives the following results: Wheat of 58-pound test weight gives 71.7 percent of flour; wheat of 59-pound test weight gives 72.90 percent of flour; wheat of 60-pound test weight gives 74.15 percent of flour. As compared to this table he shows the test on 18 samples submitted on which the test weight varied from 41.5 pounds to 49.8 pounds, and the flour percentage varied in the case of the 41.5-pound test weight, 51.60, to 58.97-percent flour on the 49.8-pound test weight. A study of this table, I think, will prove very interesting to you as it also gives the percentage of feed, the percentage of moisture, ash, and protein content in the flour. In the last column is also contained the protein content in the wheat found by our State protein laboratory, a chart of which showing the percentage of feed and flour products in the different wheats is also attached.

One of the great factors entering into the price situation of low-grade wheat this fall is the processing tax of 30 cents per bushel on wheat. Of the ordinary high-test weight, 4½ bushels of wheat will produce a barrel of flour, the processing tax on this being $1.35 on 58-pound wheat. Today's cash price in Minneapolis on 58-pound wheat runs about $1.23. The processing tax added to this, or $1.35, produces a cost to the miller for the wheat of $6.93. Of wheat weighing 50 pounds to the bushel test weight it will take 6½ bushels to produce one barrel of flour. This weight wheat today sold at an average of 97 cents, the wheat of this weight to produce a barrel of flour costing the miller $6.30, plus the processing tax of $1.95, making the cost to the millers for a barrel fo flour of this test weight $8.25. Of wheat weighing 48-pound test weight it will take 7 bushels to produce a barrel of flour. Wheat of this weight sold in Minneapolis today for a price averaging about 85 cents, making the cost to the millers for wheat to produce a barrel of flour of this test weight $5.95, plus the processing tax of $2.10, making the cost to the millers for making a barrel of flour from this test-weight wheat $8.05.

Right here I believe that you are up against one of the most insurmountable handicaps so far as the marketing of lightweight wheat is concerned in the Northwest this fall. The millers out here are voicing the sentiment that the processing tax should be levied not on each bushel of wheat but on each barrel of flour produced, which they figure would put them in a better position to compete with millers in territory where there is the regulation test-weight wheat marketed this fall.

There is another side to this picture, also; there being very little high-test weight wheat left in the Northwest, the Northwest mills will be obliged to obtain a good deal of their milling wheat from other territories that have not been afflicted as the Northwest has been afflicted this year.

I pass this along to you as I have found it. I am trying to give you the picture as it is presented to us out here. Of course, I hold no brief for the millers, and must not be understood to be doing so, but it seems to me personally that the levying of a processing tax on each barrel of flour would for us out here in the Northwest, no matter how it fits the situation in other parts of the country, be a much better thing and would work to our advantage. Possibly the Government could do this, that farmers in the Northwest whose crops were to a great extent ruined by heat and rust, when they market their crops could be in some way compensated by the Federal Government, which is now coming to the aid of everybody who has suffered under any kind of affliction, especially so in taking such great care of the tobacco and cotton raisers and other producers in the South, and could make good to the farmers who have to market this lightweight wheat in a sum per bushel that would put them on somewhat near the same basis with those whom nature and the elements have not punished this year.

I pass this on to you as the most prominent farm representative in the United States Senate to see if you cannot work out something along this line that will aid the northwestern wheat raisers in their present predicament.

Whether or not the processing tax on wheat is of the benefit to the farmers in general that it was intended to be, I do not know. It would appear from what I have here quoted you that on this year's crop it is going to be a severe handicap to the farmers who must market light-weight wheat, but, of course, this is a matter of which you probably know more than we do out here.

In the processing tax as between that paid on 58-pound wheat in a sufficient amount to make a barrel of flour and that paid upon 48-pound wheat in sufficient amount to make a barrel of flour, in the latter case the processing tax on wheat to produce a barrel of flour is 75 cents higher than in the former instance, which again means that the farmers selling 48-pound wheat are being penalized in the sum of 10½ cents per bushel for the processing tax more than is the man who is selling 58-pound wheat. The millers, of course, are passing this difference on to the farmers in a price per bushel that is that much lower.

So far as grades of grains go they are now in the first place promulgated by the Department of Agriculture at Washington. If they can at this time remedy our situation out here with lightweight wheat in affecting changes in grades, I do not know. Under the Federal Grain Act this power is given the Federal Department of Agriculture who promulgates grades on grain through its Bureau of Agricultural Economics. I can assure you that if the Department of Agriculture can find a way by which the present situation can be eased, that the State of Minnesota will cooperate to the fullest extent. They have it in their power to do almost anything they feel like doing, but I am afraid that they will, and possibly can, do nothing about it.

Down to what test weight of wheat millers can go, or will go, for the purpose of making flour, is hard to say. It seems to be the consensus of opinion that they will not go below 48 pounds. In this connection it might be well to call your attention to the fact that while the low-weight wheats will product a much smaller percentage of flour, they will again produce a much greater percentage of feeds, as, for instance, 60-pound weight wheat produces, roughly speaking, 25 percent of feed, while 48-pound wheat produces 38 percent of feed. Going to a test weight as low as 42 pounds, it appears that wheat of that weight will produce 42 percent of feed. Just what effect this will have it is hard to say. It is a byproduct which in the past has meant a big thing to the miller. There is no regulation that I know of with regard to the price of feed. All other feed crops this year being very abundant mill feeds may not be able to command a very high price, especially so due to the fact that so many cattle and hogs have been slaughtered these last years. Under ordinary circumstances as have obtained most years, this great amount of mill feedstuffs would have been a great revenue producer for the millers. How it will be this year nobody can tell. If the millers are compelled to make an extraordinary low price on mill feeds, this will again influence the price of other feedstuffs.

Our Minnesota inspection department and our boards of appeal have been instructed to keep the closest kind of watch on the marketing situation in our Minnesota terminals, especially with regard to lightweight wheat, and anything that we discover that will be of interest we will keep you fully advised on, for, even though the present Congress may soon come to a close, we would like to have you on the fighting line for us in the next session of Congress, and full publicity shall be given to all of these matters in the newspapers to the extent that we will be able to have the newspapers carry such matters.

I think that the wheat farmers of the Northwest especially are entitled to consideration at the hands of Congress and the administration, which consideration has not heretofore been given them. The efforts of the experimental stations relative to bringing out rust-resistant varieties of wheat seems, in view of the situation this year, to have been a failure. For many years back we have been told that the cause of rust was the barberry bush. The farmer has never believed so. He has believed that rust was caused by atmospheric and weather conditions, and he is possibly as right in this as are the agricultural experts.

But many people are now beginning to voice the idea that the Government should undertake a complete soil survey of the wheat-raising areas to find out whether or not certain qualities that were found in abundance in years gone by have not now become exhausted, and that possibly the remedy might not be found on the basis of such a study and survey. Reduction of acreage evidently does not prevent rust.

The farmer is evidently entitled to an intensive study of his situation along these lines—a more intensive study than what has been given to this situation up until this time.

Very respectfully,

KNUD WEFALD, Commissioner.

ADDRESS BY POSTMASTER GENERAL BEFORE CALIFORNIA FEDERATION WOMEN'S DEMOCRATIC STUDY CLASS

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address delivered by our distinguished Postmaster General, Hon. James A. Farley, Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, before the California Federation Women's Democratic Study Class, at the Ambassador Hotel, Los Angeles, Calif., August 23, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Like every other American, I am glad to come to California. You people out here ought to be happy in the thought that the residents of all other sections envy you. No State of the Union has the varied attractions that has this Golden State of yours. It is no wonder that although you are one of the young ones among the sisterhood of Commonwealths that make up our country that you have attained eminence in population, in wealth, in culture, and you have preserved to such a wonderful extent the courage and enterprise of the pioneers who came here in search of gold nearly a century ago. They found an eldorado, but like other discoverers, they did not know that the incredible fortunes they washed and grubbed out of your mountains and your river beds was only a fraction of the wealth that lay dormant in the Golden State.

I am particularly delighted at this opportunity to address the membership of the Federated Study Clubs of California. This women's organization ought to be duplicated in every State in the Union. And let me congratulate, among many others, those great women, Miss Mary Foy, Mrs. Mattison Boyd Jones, and Mrs. Betty Gilmore, who were kind enough to invite me to address this distinguished gathering. They are the true descendants and heirs of the spirit of those pioneer women who rode in the prairie schooners across the plains, or endured the hardships of the hazardous Panama route, and laid the foundations of California. I know that the old fellows who fought their way through hostile Indian tribes and conquered the obstacles of prairie desert and mountain in order to reach the Pacific coast were splendid men. Probably no group in all our history showed such a depth of courage, resource, and determination as they did. But whenever I read one of the old chronicles of the great western surge of settlers I think of a comment made by one of our Eastern orators at a Plymouth Rock celebration. He said that while he wished to pay every tribute to the qualities of the Pilgrim fathers, his own thought was mainly for the Pilgrim mothers—who not only had to endure the hardships of the voyage of the Mayflower but had in addition to endure the Pilgrim fathers themselves. So I feel that when we admire the pioneer men, we must realize that it was the pioneer women who bore the great burden. My hat is off to those women and to their descendants who are carrying on the traditions of the finest epic in American history.

I said a moment ago that I wished the study clubs could be duplicated in every American community. We are passing through one of the most important periods since we became an independent country. When the depression fell upon us with such devastating force it found us unequipped and unprepared. We had learned that we had to have a great Navy to preserve us from foreign aggression. We had learned that we had to keep the nucleus of a sufficient Army to defend our rights, if it came to war. In a degree, we had learned to provide against floods and droughts and epidemics. But when it came to a world-wide economic collapse, we were caught without charts or maps, or even a comprehensive theory as to how such a calamity should be met. As has been the case in every crisis that has come upon this country, the crisis itself produced somebody capable of dealing with it. So it was when our factories were closed, when perhaps 15,000,000 people were out of employment, when banks were toppling like tenpins and nothing seemed secure, we found a man who had a plan and was brave enough to try it out. Like your "forty-niners", he struck for a goal where no trail had been blazed; he proceeded to make his own trail; and I need not tell you, who are cognizant of the difference between today and the day that Franklin Delano Roosevelt came to the White House, that the trail he cut will endure as one of the great monuments in the history of progress.

The journey is far from complete. Every step that we take upward in the painful climbing back to the heights of prosperity brings up new obstacles, new problems. The road to such accomplishments as this Nation now is striving for is bound to be long and arduous. No small part of the difficulties that lie ahead is due to a lack of understanding, not only of the purposes to which the President's policies are directed but of the processes by which he seeks to guide us. That is where your study clubs will perform their greatest service. It is their part to resolve the complexities of an intricate problem into its simple elements, to see to it that every American citizen understands that what we are seeking, and what we hope to bring about is a restoration to work of everybody who can take a job; the elimination from our American system of doles; the reestablishment of business on a prosperous scale; and the maintenance of a high standard of living for all our people. And it must be done in such a manner as will produce the greatest aggregate of good, of happiness, and content for our whole people.

The study group idea is not only taking hold in California, but in many other States. I am delighted at the intelligent interest which is being displayed by the women, and the vigor and determination with which they are organizing in study clubs and reporter groups all over the country to learn everything they can of the President's program. Molly Dewson's reporter plan is in constant demand. I cannot pass her name by without reminding you that the women owe a great deal to her for the wisdom and courage which she has brought to the task of organizing the women of the country back of the new deal. I am frank to admit that the education program initiated by the women's division is a new venture in political tactics, but I am heartily in favor of it, not only for the women but for the men and the young Democrats. I also know that the President has given the program his endorsement. He has said many times and in many different ways that "only through a clear understanding by every citizen of the objectives, organization, and availability of the Government agencies can they render truly effective service and assure progress toward economic security."

We have come a long way toward the desired goal. We have come so far that some people, realizing that the promised land is in sight, would seek again to place their own interests above the interests of all, and to supplant the leadership that has brought us along so well with their own leadership—that same leadership which permitted us to drift into a situation from which they not only did not know the exit but had no hope of finding the way out. It undoubtedly frequently happened that when the pioneers were making their great experiment they came to an impasse—a river they could not cross, or a cliff they could not scale—and then they had to make a detour. Well, it happened in this great experiment in which the President engaged more than once. He had thought out a program that wiped out the sweatshop, abolished child labor, headed the ledger figures of business from the red-ink stage to statistics of profit, cut the unemployment in half.

The Supreme Court decided that the process was unconstitutional, that the Federal Government infringed on the rights of the States when it attempted to fix hours and wages for institutions that produced inside the borders of the State, even though those institutions' products went all over the world. In other words, the recovery program has encountered an insurmountable obstacle, for the Supreme Court has the last word on constitutional questions, and nobody—least of all the President of the United States—can dispute its authority. So a detour had to be sought, and that is what is being sought now. We will reach our destination, but not so quickly as we had hoped, despite the clamors of the group that applauds every set-back, rejoices every time a cog in the machinery of recovery goes wrong, that sneers at Congress, and calls our national legislators "rubber stamps" whenever they support the President, and hails them as great statesmen whenever they vote against something he advocates. In the old days of European kingships there was a saying that "the king can do no wrong." Our political adversaries have substituted for this expression of extravagant loyalty, "The President can do no right."

The Constitution imposes on the President the direct duty of laying before Congress such recommendations as seem to him requisite to the welfare of the Nation. What sort of a Chief Magistrate would we have if, after asking Congress to enact certain laws, he failed to urge the passage of those laws? The Constitution directs that no enactment shall become a law unless the President signs it or it is passed by a two-thirds vote of both Houses over his veto. It was never contemplated by the founders of our Government that the legislative and the executive branches should be two hostile agencies, each striving for superiority over the other. To the contrary, it was planned that they should cooperate and work together for the Nation's good. They are equal partners in the business of making the laws of the country, independent in their respective fields, but dependent, one on the other, in the final enactments.

I mention this merely to point out how silly is the cry that the President seeks to dominate Congress because he urges the passage of bills he deems necessary or the rejection of those he deems harmful. Come to think of it, I never knew of an important measure on which the Capitol and the White House differed, and which had gone through both Houses and was awaiting the President's signature or veto, that Congress did not seek to influence the President. It is almost a matter of routine under such circumstances for Congressmen to come to the White House—either as individuals or in delegations—in an effort to induce the President to accept the bill. Sometimes these visits succeed in their purpose; sometimes they fail. But I have never yet heard this process cited as an effort of the legislative to compel the Executive to do its bidding. But every time the process is reversed, and the President seeks to convert Congressmen to his own way of thinking the faultfinders raise the cry that he is striving to be a dictator and a lot more rubbish of the same sort.

There is little of criticism of or opposition to the President's policies that is not directly attributable either to politics or to the concern of a particular group anxious to preserve some undeserved advantage it has had, and so makes common cause with the political foes of the administration. We are on the verge of a campaign, and to that fact is attributable the rancor of recent outbursts. Let me take you back, to illustrate the point, to the early days of the Roosevelt regime. Newly come to the White House, with the terrific task of rehabilitating a disturbed, distressed and discouraged country on his shoulders, he stopped the panic of the banks almost overnight. Nothing but praise came to him for the startling definiteness and boldness of this act. Then he laid before the country his whole program of recovery, and part of that plan was the resolution to so shape the future course of this country that the abuses that contributed so much to the acuteness of the depression could not be continued. He laid his program before Congress, and Republicans and Democrats alike hastened to give him the requisite authority to carry out his ideas. He gathered about him the men who had made their fame in economic research; the recognized authorities in their respective fields—and Republicans and Democrats alike applauded. This was in 1933. There was no political campaign on that year. Came 1934, and the congressional elections, and the chorus of detraction rang out.

Our President was charged, in the East, with trying to impose socialism, communism, and a dozen other "isms", on us. He was charged, in the West, with being bent on a despotism in the interest of big business—that being the bogy of the times in that part of the country. Then we heard the derisive cry of "brain trust" as descriptive of the technical experts he had brought in, and they were described as wild-eyed young theorists, with the sole idea of destroying our form of government. Incidentally, let me tell you something about that "brain trust." It was composed of men whose ideas varied by far more than the difference between Democrat and Republican. They represented every possible school of thought, but they were all true, thoughtful Americans. They dictated no policies, but each contributed his view, when the President asked for it, so that he always had before him about all that was known on a given subject, from every possible angle. That is the way he works; the way he has always worked. What he wanted was the facts that had been gathered through their years of study by these men and women, who had gained their experience as members of college faculties, as research experts in big businesses, and in the Government itself. From these facts he developed his policies—and what resulted were his policies; not those of the people he had called in, fond as are our political enemies of attributing to the administration a devotion to dreamy theories.

But to get back to the matter of politics in the criticisms of the new deal. They were at their height in the fall of 1934. I dare say you all remember what happened in the elections that year; that you remember that the administration received an endorsement unparalleled in our history. There followed another period when the fault-finders, with a few chronic exceptions, were silent, and the country pursued its even course toward recovery. Then the shadow of next year's election fell over the country. There was a prompt resumption of the barrage of detraction. All the old absurdities were dusted off and some new slanders were invented. This campaign is going on and I suppose will increase in virulence until November of next year, when it will be hushed by another great endorsement of the Roosevelt administration; another acclamation for the progress we have made under the direction of the President.

The "grass roots" convention at which the opposition party was able to agree on nothing except denunciation of the President, the scurrilous chain letters with which they are flooding the mails, the incantations of their speakers and their brothers in arms, the paid advocates of special interests, create a lot of noise and raise dust storms that may temporarily blind a few people but can have no permanent effect. In all the thousands of words poured out in the last month or two there never has been the slightest suggestion of a substitute program for that which they attacked so fiercely, and, incidentally, which they paraphrased in their resolutions in order to have the appearance of some sort of a platform to present to the people.

Thousands of good folks write me letters calling attention to these attacks, suggesting methods of meeting them, and expressing their disgust at the character of the assaults. I have been much interested to note that a large proportion of these letters come from women. Perhaps because of their comparative newness in politics, they ascribe a greater degree of seriousness to the dust storms than their brothers, who recognize in the phenomena only a commonplace manifestation of a political campaign. My experience during the past few years has almost convinced me that the strength of Democracy lies largely in the feminine adherents to the party. With their keener sympathies, their higher standards, and their intuition, they are quick to perceive and applaud the efforts of the Democratic administration to make this a better country to live in, to increase the opportunities of the plain people to attain comfort, and to restore the Nation to normal prosperity without the curse of special privileges, which in the past has made our prosperity lop-sided, indeed.

We have been successful through two elections, and I attribute the volume of our success in no small degree to the maids and matrons who have not only espoused Democracy themselves, but have become missionaries among the husbands and brothers. This administration has recognized their contributions to the cause of good government to a greater extent than any previous administration. For the first time in our history there is a woman member of the Cabinet.

Yet, it would be a misstatement to attribute Frances Perkins' advent as Secretary of Labor to her sex. She was chosen for the post because her life work had been devoted to dealing with the very problems that that branch of the Government must deal with. It would be more truthful to say that the circumstance that she was a woman was not permitted to outweigh her qualifications for high office. There are other eminent women in high places in the Government who are demonstrating that administrative capacity is by no means a purely masculine trait. Josephine Roche is an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. Ruth Bryan Owen is Minister to Denmark. Former Governor of Wyoming, Nellie Tayloe Ross, is Director of the Mint. And they are all making good in some of the most difficult and responsible offices.

It might perhaps be of interest to you to know that I have appointed a thousand women to postmasterships throughout the country. Some of these are in charge of the most important cities. Here in California, for example, you have Mrs. Nellie F. Donahue as postmistress at Oakland.

I know, of course, that you in California have similarly honored your great women. Your neighbor, Mrs. Carroll Stewart, is a member of the Federal Veterans' Appeals Board, one of the three women whose advent to that Board signals the administration's recognition of the concern of women in the welfare of the boys who went to war. The superintendent of the great Massachusetts reformatory for women made her reputation as juvenile-court judge in Los Angeles. Annette Abbot Adams was brought from California to be the first woman Assistant Attorney General during the Woodrow Wilson administration. I might prolong the list indefinitely, for your fortunate State stands high in the list of those whose daughters have played an important part in our country's progress.

The University of California at Berkeley owes a debt to Phoebe A. Hearst which cannot be measured in money and no less a debt is owed by Leland Stanford University to Jane Lathrop Stanford. It was through the generous contribution of these good women that these two educational institutions stand where they do today among colleges.

Closely associated with the work of these two women is the founding of Mills College by Susan Tolman Mills. California is indeed proud of the work of these three women. And a history of education in Los Angeles cannot be written without assigning a high place to Mrs. Susan M. Dorsey.

Of the distinguished women of our own day, California numbers among its citizens the gracious and kindly former First Lady of the Land, Mrs. Herbert Hoover.

Now let me talk a little about the future. This country is by no means out of the woods. It is going to take the best efforts of every thinking man and woman to complete the work of recovery so happily begun. If we would have our ideals fulfilled, you people must do a great share of the work. Under our system, improvement in government can come only through politics. It is not as a politician, it is not as chairman of the Democratic National Committee that I ask the study clubs to work for the welfare of our people with even greater devotion than you have in the past, but simply as one good citizen to another. I call on every one of you to get into the game and see to it that we do not lose what we have gained and that every success this Nation makes or has made in the improvement of the lot of the average man and woman shall be merely the stepping stone to still greater accomplishments.

GOLD AND ITS EFFECT ON THE FARMER'S INCOME

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Frank E. Gannett, publisher of the Gannett newspapers, before the annual Farm and Home Conference at the University of Vermont, Burlington, Vt., August 21, 1935, on the subject of Gold and Its Effect Upon the Farmer's Income.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

It is stimulating indeed to come to a State which stands out over the years as the birthplace and home of men and women who have been, and are, conspicuous for their courage, initiative, thrift, self-reliance, and sound attitude toward life. One cannot think of Vermont without thinking of granite, and granite suggests a characteristic of her people—solid, enduring, able to withstand any blows, unmoved by lashing storms, rugged, dependable. I say this in all sincerity as an accurate expression of how those outside your borders regard you.

My visit here has inspired me to depart a bit from the subject assigned me and, with your permission, to say a few words on conditions now prevailing, which mean so much to you and to me. Never did the world face so many serious, alarming situations as today. Never have we needed clearer thinking, saner judgment, and greater devotion to righteousness in attempting to find a solution of our perplexing problems. And where can we find a more representative gathering of people capable of facing any crisis and fighting it through than we have here today? Would that all of our 130,000,000 people had the fortitude, the faith, the independence, the sense of individual responsibility that is typical of the people of this State. If all were like you, we would never doubt the future of America.

Let me hasten to say that I come to you today with a feeling of more optimism, more hope, more encouragement than I have had in a long time. Like you who live in Vermont, I refuse to despair, no matter how dark the days may seem. I know that we ultimately will emerge from any adversity and be benefited by our experience. We go forward despite the wails of the pessimists. So, I repeat, I come here today confident that we are making progress, confident that we are in many ways better off today than we were last year or in any previous year in our history, if we take everything into consideration.

It is true we are still in a mess. But we always were in a mess of one kind or another. And we always shall have problems to meet, wrongs to right, and perfection far off and elusive. But haven't we many blessings that we never had before; haven't we all broader, more interesting lives and a better conception of what we are striving for? Of course we have. For that reason we can attack our problems with more intelligence and more effectiveness and attain speedier results.

We have just come through the greatest depression of all time. I am convinced by my study of statistics and by what I learn from men in high places in our industrial and economic life that we are definitely on the upgrade. Business conditions should be better, not worse. Recovery may be slow and not spectacular, perhaps only partial, but it is on the way. My hope is that it will come fast enough to relieve the great strain that we have been under before there is any further breaking down of the fundamental structures that support our economic and national life.

What caused this disastrous depression? Many have advanced their theories, but, in my opinion, it is all as clear as day and easily proved by scientific facts. The depression was a collapse in prices. This collapse in prices here and elsewhere was due to the increased value of gold. Let us go back to some fundamentals.

Gold is a commodity, just as tin, lead, zinc, corn, wheat, and lumber are commodities. You know that all commodities are subject to the law of supply and demand.

The amount of gold in the world is limited and its production barely keeps pace with the increase in business. The demand for it varies greatly. In the early 1920's all the nations in the world began to bid for gold. Gold became more valuable. The value—note I say value, not price—more than doubled, from 1929 to 1933. In other words, it was necessary to give twice as much wheat, corn, or cotton for the same amount of gold. That made 50-cent wheat instead of a dollar. All the basic commodities became cheap. Prices tumbled not only in America, but throughout the world. You men and women who produce the commodities of the farm appreciate how important in our lives are prices. America today is little changed from the America of 1929. We have practically the same resources, the same capacity to produce, the same skill and efficiency, but prices have changed and this change in prices is, as I have said, the cause of all our woes and our misery.

Here is another important point. There are two kinds of prices—prices that fluctuate greatly and prices that fluctuate but little. In your cost of living are many prices that do not change materially no matter what business conditions may be. They include freight rates, bus and train fares, electric-light and gas bills, telephone and telegraph charges, interest, and insurance. But the prices of basic commodities—wheat and other grains, cotton, tin, lead, zinc, copper, lumber, etc., are sensitive. They change constantly.

In the collapse of prices in 1929 the basic commodity prices—the prices of those commodities that you produce—took a great tumble, but the other prices, those which are administratively set or largely fixed, remained practically stationary. The collapse of commodity prices wiped out billions of dollars of America's purchasing power.

Between 1923 and 1929, inclusive, the average annual income of agriculture was $11,589,000,000. In 1930, because of the change in the value of gold, farmers' income dropped sharply so that in 1932 it was only $5,330,000,000. During the 5-year period 1930–34, the farmers were short $22,788,000,000 of their normal income, the levy of destruction upon one class of citizens equal to the total United States debt at that time. Today, due to the excessive buying power of our dollar, farmers' income is short of normal about $5,000,000,000 annually.

I want this restored to agriculture, not merely as an act of simple justice to the farmers of the country, but, unless their lost buying power is restored, they cannot buy from industry, and industry cannot give normal employment. Here is the crux of the whole depression. We must restore farmers' and basic prices and income so that industry can sell to these 55,000,000 people as it formerly did and again give normal employment.

You in this audience understand how hard the farmer was hit when the prices of his commodities fell while other prices, the prices of many things that he bought, were not materially changed.

There is much confusion about the cost of living. The city worker complains when the price of wheat is raised, but, strange to say, raising the price of wheat does not immediately or equally affect the price of the bread he has to buy. The reason, of course, is that many items of cost in making wheat into flour and flour into bread and of distributing the bread are practically fixed, subject to little change. These fixed prices in the cost of production are more important in the final price than the cost of the raw product. The baker pays about the same rent, insurance, taxes, wages to his workers, interest on his capital investment when wheat is $1 as he does when wheat is 50 cents a bushel. Whether the price of wheat rises or falls does not therefore affect to anywhere near the same extent the cost of bread.

Failure to understand this distinction between fixed prices and flexible prices confuses many people. When they see the price of the farmer's products rise they immediately complain about an increase in the cost of living, when, as a matter of fact, changes in the cost of living are very slow and small compared with other price changes.

But to get back to gold. The value of this commodity rose throughout the world. Until we went off the old gold standard we said that a certain weight of gold at a price of $20.67 an ounce was a dollar. This gold as a commodity doubled in value, so the dollar really was worth $2 in purchasing power. Money, after all, is what it will buy. The Supreme Court has said this emphatically. With this increase in the value of gold, the dollar was doubled in purchasing power, and all of you producers of basic commodities suffered.

Although we use checks and paper money to carry on exchange, in the last analysis the amount of gold in the dollar determines the value of all our dollars. The great price collapse in 1929 and all of those great slumps, depressions, and hard times that this country has gone through were due to an increase in the value of gold as a commodity and the consequent increase in the purchasing power of the dollar because that dollar was based on a definite amount of gold.

The dollar, used as a measuring stick of value, has been constantly changing. If you think of the dollar as a yardstick of value, it was a 36-inch yardstick in 1933, a 51-inch yardstick in 1896, and a 19-inch yardstick in 1920. What would you think of buying cloth in a store where they used a yardstick of such varying length? What would you think of the grocer who changed the pound measure constantly? You would not tolerate such an outrage; and yet the dollar, our measure of value, has been changing constantly. Because we did not know it, we did not protest. At last science has disclosed to us how we have been cheated by this changing measure of value, and the Nation at last is being aroused.

Here is how this changing measure of value works: A farmer gives a mortgage for $10,000 on his farm. This mortgage, when made, could be paid back with 10,000 bushels of wheat; but the value of the dollar changes, and he may find it necessary to give 20,000 bushels of wheat to pay the mortgage. Or he may be lucky and be able to pay it off with 5,000 bushels of wheat, if the value of gold falls.

When the prices of 50 basic commodities, in relation to a small quantity of gold, change, isn't it common sense to assume that these basic commodities have not changed in value but that the one commodity, gold, has changed in value? And yet we have been taking the attitude of the mother who said that all of the boys in the regiment were out of step but her son Jim. We have assumed that the value of one commodity, gold, was eternally the same, while the value of all other commodities changed when, of course, the reverse is the case.

We should have as a measure of value a dollar not made up of a certain amount of gold at a certain price but a dollar that would buy an average given amount of 50 or so basic commodities. Then these commodities would not fluctuate in price and we would not have the great depressions and inflations that come as a result of wide fluctuation in prices.

We could have such a dollar by changing its gold content or by raising the price of gold, which accomplishes the same purpose. In other words, we should manage our currency so that the dollar will have the same purchasing power over a generation.

What a wonderful advance in business such a monetary unit would be. Confidence is the first requisite for business activity. If we could be assured that the dollar we have today would have the same purchasing power tomorrow, next year, and 10 years from now, we could proceed with business transactions. If you knew that the prices of your commodities were to be relatively the same, you would sleep better and stop worrying over prices for your products.

When I was in Europe recently I found Great Britain enjoying prosperity. Everything is booming in England. Ask any intelligent British business man and he will tell you that England's quick recovery and her prosperity today are due, in a large measure, to her managed currency. In London the price of gold is changed almost daily. In other words, the pound represents from day to day a varying amount of gold. By changing the price of gold, prices of other commodities are stabilized and the London business man goes ahead making commitments for wheat, for cotton, or for any other commodity, knowing that the price next month or next fall will be relatively stable.

Great Britain's recovery was surprising to me. The number of unemployed is now the lowest in many years. Thousands of houses are being built and every line of business is active. This recovery is being experienced by those countries dependent upon Great Britain—those countries that do business on the pound sterling and manage their money in the same way as Great Britain does hers, and that we refer to as the "sterling area." Australia, New Zealand, Sweden, Denmark, and Argentina are especially prosperous because they have raised the price of gold and are doing business with a managed currency.

What a contrast I found in the gold-bloc countries in Europe—France, Italy, Germany, Holland, and Switzerland. These countries have clung to the old price of gold with the result that prices of other commodities have continued to fall. Recently you have been reading about critical conditions in France, due to her clinging to the old price for gold and her refusal to devalue the franc in the face of changed world conditions. In France unemployment, foreclosures, business failures have all been increasing. A banker who just returned from France told me a few days ago that anything could happen in France—a revolution even may result if the Government persists in forcing deflation—in other words, if they try to force down prices further. The so-called "fixed prices" must either fall or prices of commodities rise in order to return to balance. Efforts to force down fixed prices, such as wages, salaries, and other prices I have mentioned, usually bring an uprising.

It was such economic conditions as are developing in France that caused the overthrow of governments in Italy, Germany, and Russia. A time comes when the people will not stand more deflation and will resist or overthrow any government that persists in deflation. In 1932 we had in the Midwest conditions that approached revolution, when farmers congregated and refused to permit foreclosure on their farms because conditions which they could not control were robbing them of their possessions. The plight of the midwestern farmer was due to gold, but he blamed the Government.

With such concrete illustrations before us as are afforded by conditions in Great Britain and in France and the gold-bloc countries, isn't it strange that intelligent America doesn't understand the cause and the cure? On one hand, we have recovery and prosperity under a managed currency; on the other, we have depression, distress, disaster under the old fixed gold standard.

To make the point more clear, let me illustrate. Let us say a pound of cotton exchanges for a grain of gold in New York, Liverpool, Bremen, Havre, or any other seaport in the world. So with other basic commodities that are sold in the world market. By managing our currency we can determine whether this grain of gold will be 5 cents, 10 cents, or 20 cents.

I flew to Buenos Aires last fall. I found great prosperity in the Argentine. We will say the farmer there sold a bushel of wheat for 20 grains of gold. We may say that this represented a peso. The Argentine devalued the dollar so that now the same 20 grains of gold represents 3 pesos. Thus the farmer in the Argentine is now getting higher prices for his wheat, his hogs, his cattle, and all his other products.

It all seems very simple to me, and I am glad to say that, for the first time in our history, our people are beginning to understand gold and its effect on our economic life. We know now that the fluctuating value of gold caused our depressions and our booms. Knowing the cause, we should set up the cure. We should have in Washington a monetary authority of the same integrity and high standing as the Supreme Court, with members elected for life, beyond the reach of political or financial pressure and able to act with courage and independence. This monetary authority could have furnished to it by Congress a set of guideposts, so that whenever the average prices of commodities varied to a certain extent they could change the gold content of the dollar and stabilize prices. This, I believe, is one of the most necessary steps to promote recovery and prevent another great fluctuation in prices, such as is sure to bring another great economic disaster.

America cannot stand another such shock as we have just had, and the machinery should be set up at once to prevent the chaos which is certain to follow unless we act with intelligence and establish a sane, sound, safe monetary system which will give us an honest dollar of the same purchasing power over a generation.

But why need I talk to you more about managed currency and its effect on prices? I feel that you farmers know more about it than any other group. That is the one policy on which the five national farm organizations have united. They urge the adoption of the managed-currency system, that will prevent booms and depressions, that will secure justice between classes. This system has been put to test since 1931 by England. She manages her money, but does not attempt to have the Government manage everything else. Managed currency has restored prosperity and prices for her sterling area.

However, there are many other factors in our situation which need consideration, and I am going to depart from my topic and mention some of them. My visit to this State naturally brings them to the forefront in my mind.

It is the individual, not the Government, that has made America great. Government cannot and must not displace the individual, deprive him of opportunity, initiative, freedom, and liberty of action. Yet today we see a tendency in our country to have government regulate and manage everything and everybody. The time has come, in my opinion, when vigorous steps must be taken to protect those attributes that are characteristic of the people of Vermont, so that we may foster and promote courage, self-reliance, thrift, and independence instead of suppressing and restricting them.

I am not one who defends all that has happened in America in the past. I do not for a minute deny that grave abuses crept into our social system and that drastic steps were necessary to eradicate some of the evils. As a Republican, I even commend our President for some of the things he has done and for having the courage to put the spotlight on some of these abuses, but I do not agree with him or his administration on all the methods that have been adopted.

I claim that here in America we have nurtured in our people the quality of individual courage, initiative, and self-reliance that gives us distinction among the nations of the world. As I have said before, Vermont is one of the cradles of these qualities. I cannot go along with any program, no matter how badly reform is needed, which does not take as its first premise this protection of the individual right to live and plan his own life. It is on this consideration that I find I must break with many of the so-called "new deal" policies. They put the State in place of the man.

Now, I would not have much self-respect if I just said this and could offer no other program for doing what it is obvious must be done in this country—that is, to establish a greater degree of social and economic justice. I think this can be done, and I think it can be done in a way which will safeguard the spiritual as well as the economic rights of the individual. It can be done in such a way that this country will continue to be the America that you and I love. But what program would I suggest?

I always try to get down to fundamentals. I believe, and sincerely believe, that practically all of the abuses which come so near destroying this country, and the attempted cure which may yet destroy us, can be laid at the door of the following:

First, a foolish, unsound, uneconomic, oftentimes dishonestly manipulated monetary system, which I have tried to describe and which has permitted great fluctuation in prices.

Second, the ravages of war. There is nothing more important in your life and mine than international peace; yet I see America doing little to promote it. The threat of war hangs over the whole world today. We are fortunate to be some distance from the dynamite that may explode at any time, but we are not sure that another explosion will not involve us, no matter how firm may be our intentions of keeping away from it.

Last week a dispatch from Washington stated that appropriations for our Army and Navy this year amount to the staggering sum of $896,000,000—almost a billion dollars—in time of peace. This figure means an annual cost of $6.25 for every man, woman, and child. Just think how enormous is this burden.

While we are spending almost a billion dollars to prepare for a possible war, we are spending practically nothing to promote peace. For a long time I have urged, and I repeat it here, that we should have a Secretary of Peace as well as a Secretary of War and a Secretary of the Navy, and we should make at least a small appropriation to promote international understanding and good will. We could do much to remove the causes of war if we set out to use intelligently the press, radio, motion picture, and other means of information. None of the people in the world want war any more than you and I want it; but governments mislead people, inflame them by taking advantage of their ignorance and prejudice, and before anyone knows what it is all about, men are at each other's throats.

A year from now a great political campaign will be under way. So far no one has had the vision to see that there is nothing more important than a vigorous, constructive leadership for promoting peace and abolishing war. Such a question surely is far more important than all the rantings of the cheap politicians who spend their time in criticizing or defending insignificant and unimportant details of government.

A third fundamental is that our country cannot prosper unless agriculture prospers. We have had in the past a policy of milking agriculture up to the point where the cow began to dry off, and then we tried to get her back into production with shots of stimulants like farm boards, cotton loans, and A. A. A., instead of keeping agriculture going by sound, long-time feeding policies.

I am entirely in sympathy with the present administration in its desire to help farmers. The establishment of the Farm Credit Administration marked an important step in the establishment of agriculture on a sound financial basis. The semicooperative features of the Farm Credit Administration as they have been worked out and applied by Gov. W. I. Myers are admirable. I have the profoundest respect and admiration for Bill Myers, as we know him in New York State. There is no better equipped man in the United States to administer the credit affairs of farmers.

I fear, however, as I look into the future, that sound agricultural credit will be broken down by legislation which makes mandatory unsound financing of agriculture. I refer to such things as commodity loans at the market, loans at ruinous interest rates, and loans based on fiat money. Such loans should never be made; it is suicide for agriculture to make them any part of the financing through the Farm Credit Administration. I fear, too, that the greed for power of Democratic politicians may destroy the semicooperative features of farm credit as it is established.

When it comes to the long pull, I believe no such scheme as the Agricultural Adjustment Administration can succeed. It is too big to administer. If it could be administered, the adjustments in production which it makes will be wiped out at least half of the time by the weather. As a farm boy, you see I have great respect for the weather. Finally, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration is un-American in both its principle and its application.

By production control the A. A. A. seeks to make things scarce and high. If they are scarce, as hogs now are, the farmer's returns are small and his costs are high. Volume in agricultural production is just as important in determining both the gross and net returns as it is in my newspaper plants. If things are high, the consumer can't buy. And right here I'd like to stop a moment to say a word about this same consumer.

The consumptive limit of the American people has never yet been reached. Scarcity and high prices destroy consumption. The most pressing problem before the American farmer is not, therefore, production control but the lowering of the costs of distribution so that the consumer may buy more, raise his standard of living, and go on to an ever-increasing state of well-being.

When it comes to the application of the A. A. A. program, it is just as un-American as the principle. If it is made to go, the A. A. A. inevitably must rigidly govern by bureaucrats millions of freedom-loving, proud, and spirited farm people. I have only to remind you of one of your own Vermont town meetings to show how far the farmers of the United States will then have digressed from those principles to which they dedicated this Nation. Even at the cost of better farm prices, there is no room in this country for the bureaucrat or economic dictator.

For these reasons I do not believe that the present administration will develop from the A. A. A. a permanent contribution to agriculture. I believe that a succeeding administration which is not committed to the economic policies of theorists and bound by its own hasty commitments may get something out of Farm Board and A. A. A. experience. In fact, I think it can even develop a program for agriculture within the limitations of the Constitution and the principles and practices which are a part of the American tradition.

Such things as a permanent land policy, extension of agricultural financing on a sound basis, the orderly upbuilding of farmer-owned, farmer-controlled cooperatives, renewed emphasis on research and education, both of which have suffered under Secretary Wallace, and, finally, some plan which will be participated in all along the line for the distribution of surpluses when, and if, they occur commend themselves to me.

Above everything else, however, I have unlimited faith in the ability of the farmer living on the land to work out most of his problems personally and in cooperation with his fellow farmer. My chief indictment, in fact, of the present administration's agricultural program, with the possible exception of the Farm Credit Administration, is that it entirely ignored the brains and ability of the average farmer. It leaves no place in its scheme for his contribution. This despite the fact that this average farmer has been able to take an average farm, erect the highest standard of living of any agricultural people in the world, educate his children, and contribute an untold wealth of material to the man-power of the Nation.

Fourth, the unbridled greed of a few individuals and a few corporate bodies have tended to bring all commercial institutions into disrepute, to the point where some would put the state above the individual. But to do this would mean this country we love would no longer be America. Capital should have a fair return, but after capital has a fair return, the profits should be distributed to workers and consumers instead of being centralized in the hands of a few.

Recently we have heard much about a program to tax wealth and profits. I believe that taxes should be levied on ability to pay, but taxes do not bring about a distribution of profits. Such discriminatory taxes put a burden on business, kill initiative, and lead to extravagant spending on the part of the government which levies them. It would be far better to reduce taxes by rigid economy in government so there would be more profits to divide with the producer and the consumer, as I have outlined.

You people of Vermont seem to understand better than most that an individual cannot spend himself into prosperity and that he cannot spend more than he can earn or produce, without getting into serious difficulties. You have a wide reputation for keeping within your budgets and exercising thrift and rigid economy. The Government does not differ from the individual in this respect. No government can go on spending limitless sums, sums greater than it can raise in taxes, without getting into difficulties.

I believe we must not let our brothers starve; but social justice must work both ways. Idleness and subsistence on relief or charity must not become too deeply embedded in our national life. There must be individual effort to help meet the situation, instead of a complete submission to conditions. We must not overlook the fact that our primary problem is to remove the causes of the break-down, so that private enterprise can again give full employment—the best form of social security is more jobs than men.

A fifth fundamental is that there must be a greater measure of social justice. Many of our social ills are the result of too rapid growth. It will take time to solve them, but they exist and must be recognized.

I have been an earnest advocate of caring for the old, infirm, and unfortunate. Most of us hope to see the time when we can retire from work and have a competence, but measures to bring about these objectives must not be so hastily drawn and ill-considered as to make the whole situation more difficult and further restrict and hamper individual effort.

America today is the most fortunate country in the world. Her resources are magnificent—unequaled. Our people are intelligent, versatile, ingenious, efficient. The developments of the past few years make it possible to produce plenty of everything. Surely we should be able to find a way to distribute this plenty so that everyone will be able to have all that he needs and wants. America has not overproduced. I have said this repeatedly. Statistics prove this. The trouble is that we have not been able to purchase the things we need. Prices, a faulty monetary system, and a faulty economic system have checked consumption so that all have suffered.

There is much for us to be concerned about. We are confronted by the gravest problems that our Nation has ever faced. However, I have faith in our people and in their ability to solve their problems and protect their institutions. These institutions have given us more invention, more wealth production, more widely distributed well-being than any people ever enjoyed. The fundamentals of the system have been proved sound. We need but analyze and remove the causes that brought about the break-down of 1929. We must eliminate the politician who thinks only of securing and holding office by using the tricks of the demagogue. We need the leadership of unselfish, far-sighted men of ability and achievement to help us work out our solution. Let us face the facts. The situation is serious. Let us interest ourselves in our Government. Let us put in office the right sort of men. Let us do our plain duty, and I can see coming out of our recent experience an America greater, happier, and more prosperous than ever before, a nation that should lead the world to permanent peace and well-being for all.

ACHIEVEMENTS AND PROSPECTS OF THE ROOSEVELT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, for 2½ years Franklin D. Roosevelt has been in the White House. No man in our history assumed office during more perilous times. No man has been more possessed of the poise, the courage, the character, and the talents to meet the problems of state. No man has been more successful in reviving the hopes and opportunities of the common people.

THE EMERGENCE OF THE NEW DEAL

The economic depression which challenged Roosevelt when he became President was, when viewed superficially, one of the most baffling enigmas of all time. It was a panic, not of poverty but of plenty. In the factory glistening machinery of stupendous potential energy was lying quiet. On the farm surplus products were rotting away in the fields. In the banks idle currency was stacked as in the treasury of an insatiable miser. Honesty of purpose and steadfastness of character had not departed from our sorely tired people. Yet, upon sober analysis, the problem was not baffling at all. We knew that there had been absent from the scene that vital spark which can be supplied only by sympathetic and sensitive government.

Some governments render their greatest services in times of prosperity. Others show their true merits only when the winds of adversity blow strongest. Those who controlled our national policies during the 12 years after 1920 were tested by unmatched prosperity and by untold adversity and failed miserably to meet the demands of either. When Dame Fortune beckoned, she charmed them as the song of the siren, and led them into the trap of speculation that ended in disaster. While the song lasted their ears and eyes were closed to the muted cries of those who were not marching to the music; to the 90 percent of our population who were receiving only 10 percent of the national income; to the pale, emaciated faces of children who enjoyed neither the sunshine nor the school; to the men and women idle despite their eagerness to work; to the depressive forces arising from the growing disparity between the production and the consumption of wealth. And when hard times came, their merry carelessness was succeeded by a stupefied overcaution that paralyzed action. Not only did they offer no solution—they did not even see the problems.

In truth, no government could see the problems of the twentieth-century America, so long as it clung blindly to the slogans and practices of the preindustrial era. The gospel of self-reliance and rugged individualism, the delivery of constitutional orations, could not minister to the needs of an interdependent society groping desperately for salvation through cooperation.

The new deal has devised a cooperative program that is profoundly conscious of the responsibilities of government, but that has never ignored individual rights or disparaged the values of personal initiative.

OUR HUMANE AND CONSTRUCTIVE RELIEF AND REEMPLOYMENT POLICIES

The acid test facing the Roosevelt administration in 1933 was the existence of 15,000,000 unemployed. To grasp the tragic import of their plight, it is not enough to say that they were hungry and cold. Even an animal can starve to death. But imagine what was happening to the minds and spirits of men who, having been taught that America was a land of opportunity, saw their young and innocent children crippled by privation; who, having been schooled in self-reliance, found every road of opportunity barred against them; who, having breathed the air of freedom, became the stifled victims of circumstance. A few more years of such degradation and they would have been, in accordance with Markham's immortal description, "dull to rapture and despair, stolid and stunned, a brother to the ox."

The new administration sensed at once that upon the fate of these people depended the future of America. The humane expenditure of over $3,000,000,000 has brought relief if not repose to an average of 16,000,000 men, women, and children. If gladness has not yet entered into their lives, at least despair has given way to hope. They know that they will not be allowed to starve.

Seeking to serve the spirit as well as the body, and to encompass in all our emergency activities the permanent welfare of the Nation as a whole, we have recognized that relief can never take the place of work. As quickly as possible there have been marshaled and put into operation a vast array of public-works projects, endowing 3,000,000 people with a feeling of dignity and usefulness that had too long been denied. Another 300,000 of our young manhood, who had been the floaters of society, buffeted and torn by every chance current until they were losing all sense of moral direction, are now at work in the Civilian Conservation camps. Their vigor and initiative are being revived, while they pour their splendid strength into the conservation and development of our natural resources. When industry calls upon their services, they will come forth not as the dregs of society ruined by misfortune, but as young knights bearing the standard of confidence and accomplishment.

SALVATION OF HOME OWNERSHIP

Next to life itself the typical American cherishes his home. Our second step was to isolate and then to cure the terrible epidemic of foreclosures that each year was driving 200,000 farm and urban families from their beloved hearthstones. Through the farm mortgage and the home loan measures over 2,000,000 families who had lived in daily dread of the auctioneer have been saved from eviction. Freed from excessive mortgage burdens, 275,000 happy home owners have borrowed money from the Government at low rates of interest to recondition their dwellings. Over $50,000,000 have already been expended to add light and sanitation to the daily habitat of reunited families.

Supplementary to this we have passed the National Housing Act. Under its provisions Government insurance of loans is releasing the mainsprings of credit for building purposes. Already $203,000,000 of private capital have leaped into action at the first call of opportunity. At the same time, the supervision of interest rates by the Government has set a trap for the loan shark, and is banishing his pernicious presence from the whole realty field.

RESURGENCE OF FARM INCOME

In the task of economic reconstruction our attention centered upon the farmer. We saw that millions of our countrymen, who retain to a larger extent perhaps than others the pioneer American spirit, and who supply the metropolis not only with the foodstuffs and fabrics of life but also with a large part of its genius and talent, were plowing their energies into the ground and reaping only the bitterness of failure. Agricultural income fell from $14,000,000,000 in 1920 to $4,000,000,000 in 1932. Farmers were finding it less disastrous to burn their products than to sell them. The volume of farm foreclosures rose to 213,000 in 1933. Hardy exponent of freedom, the farmer was being reduced to the status of the medieval serf. Incensed by adversity, the most conservatizing and law-abiding element in our national life was driven into open rebellion against law.

What has happened since then? In 2 years evictions have been cut in half. Over $3,000,000,000 in Government refinancing has reduced the farm mortgage burden by 21 percent. The prices of wheat and cotton are more than twice as high as in early 1933, while corn has risen over 400 percent. The cash income of farmers in 1934 was $2,000,000,000 greater than in 1932, representing a gain exceeding 50 percent; and an even larger increase is presaged for the current year. The farmer has recaptured his rightful position in our economy.

RENEWED INTEGRITY OF OUR FINANCIAL SYSTEM

When the beleaguered home owner, the harassed farmer, and the jobless worker attempted to draw upon their meager savings, they found all too often that their fiduciaries had failed. The general business upheaval, the mad entry of commercial and savings banks into the field of pure speculation, and the inordinate puffing of the stock market, conspired to bring about that panic-stricken day when every bank in the country was forced to close its doors.

Faced with the greatest financial crisis in our history, the accurate marksmanship of the Roosevelt policies hit the bullseye of our every financial need. In the first place, the ordinary bank that handles the savings of the small man has been forbidden to play with them in the dangerous underground passages of security affiliates. Banking has been divorced from gambling. Secondly, the investor is protected. The principle of truth and fair disclosure has been written in indelible letters upon every counter where securities are traded. Fooling the public has been transformed from an honored accomplishment into a crime. Thirdly, and most important of all, bank deposits have been made secure. Forty-eight and five-tenths percent of all accounts are now insured; 49,021,000 separate accounts, representing the sum of $35,987,000,000, are protected in full. Has this cost the Government anything? On the contrary, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has made profits of $4,236,000.

In 1933, the Federal Reserve Board recorded 1,799 bank failures, involving $1,228,000,000. During the first half of the present year there were only 62, aggregating $27,577,000. In mute but eloquent testimony to renewed confidence are the figures showing that in 1934 the total bank deposits in the United States increased by $6,206,000,000.

PUBLIC STIMULATION TO INDUSTRY

No responsible person would have the brazen effrontery to claim that these activities are in themselves unworthy. To rescue the unemployed from starvation, to keep the family circle intact in the home, to protect the helpless widow against the dissipation of her savings, to make the farmer a free man, are all objectives that cannot be challenged.

But by subtle indirection, by appealing to irrational prejudices rather than to reason, by quoting slogans while ignoring statistics, critics of our program are claiming that it is injurious to the recovery of private business. The clear implication of their argument is that the prosperity of industry depends upon the continuing impoverishment and suffering of the vast multitude of our people. Such a claim is as shocking to common morality as it is contrary to common sense. It will be repudiated by business itself. No business wants to place itself again in the safekeeping of that bankrupt leadership which came so close to ruining the country.

Let us examine rather minutely the close interaction between the steps that we have taken and the process of industrial recovery.

Has the home refinancing program injured private business? It is not difficult to trace exactly what has happened to the $2,702,000,000 that the Federal Government has made available for this purpose. Forty-three percent of the money has been used to pay the home owners' debts to savings and commercial banks, thus liquefying the reserves of business men and making larger credits available for their daily needs.

Thirty-five percent has been paid to building-and-loan associations and 20 percent to mortgages and life-insurance companies, thus boosting realty values, thawing out commercial paper, and rescuing from imminent insolvency the props of our whole financial structure. All in all, 98 percent of the credit extended to home owners has been devoted to the repayment of banks and similar institutions. In reducing the crushing burden of debt we have primed the pump of credit and saved both borrowers and lenders from a dismal swamp of stagnation.

Has the farm relief program been injurious to private business? The $2,000,000,000 in additional farm income has swelled the demand for the machinery, the clothing, and the automobiles that industry produces. Of the financial aid that the Government has extended to the farming population, commercial banks have received $420,000,000; insurance companies have received $243,000,000; joint-stock and land banks have received $129,000,000; taxing authorities have received $53,000,000; and individual and unclassified creditors have received $755,000,000. Of every dollar that the Farm Credit Administration has lent the farmer, 89.9 cents have been used to pay his business and banking debts.

Have our financial reforms hurt business? One would have to sink to the deepest depths of the ridiculous to claim that industry is the loser, because our banks are now safe.

Have our relief and public-works policies impaired business? To hear some of the current criticism, one might suppose that the spending activities of the Government were taking place upon the planet of Mars. In reality what has happened to the $990,000,000 that the Public Works Administration has already allocated to non-Federal projects? Two hundred and twenty-nine million dollars have been spent upon building construction. The building contracts have been awarded to private business; the materials have been purchased from private business; the wages earned by the workers have been spent for the products of private business; the profits have all accrued to private business. Does this bespeak the destruction of enterprise? Next, $243,000,000 have been spent for sewerage and water systems, thus improving the sanitary conditions in far-flung communities. Is the protection of public health bad for business? Two hundred and fifty-two million dollars have been spent upon railways, streets, and highways, thus opening new avenues for safer, speedier, and cheaper traffic, and communication from coast to coast. Two hundred and forty million dollars have been devoted to the development of engineering structures, flood control, power, and reclamation. Another $25,000,000 have been devoted to miscellaneous public improvements. If some wise and all-powerful industrial magnate had sought to increase the wealth-producing equipment of the Nation and thus lay the foundation for profitable enterprise, what more fundamental achievements could he have wrought?

In short, these activities of the Government have afforded opportunities to lend idle money to the State at fair rates of interest; they have conserved natural resources; they have reared public improvements at a time when they could be constructed most cheaply; they have pumped the revitalizing fluid of purchasing power through every artery of trade. And, most important of all, they have preserved for the day of economic revival the health and morale of our rich human materials.

The aid the Federal Government has extended to private business has by no means been limited to indirection. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has assisted hard-pressed banks, insurance companies, and other financial institutions with the stupendous total of $3,984,000,000 in loans and subscription. It has rescued our railroads from sure disaster by extending credit to the extent of $486,000,000. It has advanced $439,000,000 to finance agricultural commodities. It has lent $22,000,000 to industrial and commercial concerns. It has pumped $157,000,000 into self-liquidating products. In the aggregate it has proffered $5,528,000,000 to private enterprise.

When we bulk together the banker, the farmer, the industrialist, the home owner, and the railroad, we find that for every dollar of relief extended to the weary job hunter $10 are being advanced to stimulate private business on every front. And this assistance is being extended so sanely, so constructively, and upon such sound business principles that in the short space of 3 years over 50 percent of all Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans have been repaid.

INDUSTRIAL REFORMS

These figures are breathtaking in their sweep and accomplishment. But when the final verdict of history is written, I am certain that it will regard as the greatest boon granted to business the opportunity that business has had to practice self-government.

During the rapid development of our industrial system prior to 1929, our business morality and our mechanisms for social control did not keep pace with our material development. Predatory monopoly was rampant. Piratical practices were in the ascendancy. The motto of "rugged individualism", which had served so well in the era of the pioneer, was becoming the mere apologetic of the profiteer. Honest enterprise was forced to resort to the unfair practices of dishonest enterprise.

In the fierce competitive race, wages were forced lower and lower until the bottom dropped out and chaos reigned supreme.

Every sane business man realized that some rationalizing principle was necessary to create order out of this chaos. The National Industrial Recovery Act afforded the opportunity. Under that act, many serious mistakes have been made, but also under its inspiration there have been accomplished the greatest social advances in so short a period within our memories. Public opinion is fickle, but it swings back to the truth. The principles of N. R. A. will not be abandoned so long as sensible men believe that cooperation is superior to strife. They will not be forsaken so long as we hold that light is better than ignorance in respect to the practices whereby business is run. They will not be surrendered so long as we believe in the stabilization of wages and hours, not only as a humane dictate of conscience but also as the basic requirement for steady and profitable business operations. Neither industry nor labor nor the consumer liked everything that the N. R. A. did. But neither industry nor labor nor the consumer will ever be willing to return to the exploitation and deception that we witnessed in the past.

PROFITS MULTIPLY ON ALL FRONTS

These are the things we have done for business. Let us now study the results. The profits of all manufacturing and trading corporations, which were $640,000,000 in 1933, rose to $1,051,000,000 in 1934, a gain of 64 percent. During the same period the earnings of banks and other trust and investment institutions rose from $210,000,000 to $240,000,000, an increase of 14 percent. I want to read into the RECORD some typical examples of the spectacular improvements that reflected the first year of the new deal. Between 1933 and 1934 the agricultural implements industry rose from a deficit of $10,500,000 to a profit of $2,500,000. Profits in automobile accessories mounted from $2,900,000 to $22,136,000, a gain of 659 percent. Profits in chemicals ascended from $97,000,000 to $117,000,000, a gain of 20 percent. The electrical equipment industry rallied from a deficit of $14,000,000 to a profit of $19,000,000. The steel industry reduced its deficit from $67,000,000 to $12,000,000. Profits in the office-equipment trade rose from $6,600,000 to $18,500,000, a gain of 177 percent. Profits in printing and publishing increased from $5,900,000 to $13,400,000, a gain of 125 percent.

Even more significant were the expanding activities of those industries which minister directly to the creature comforts of the average citizen. Between 1933 and 1934 profits in food products rose from $76,800,000 to $87,400,000, a gain of 14 percent. In heating and plumbing a deficit of $6,000,000 was replaced by a profit of almost $4,000,000. In household-goods supplies, profits augmented from $19,000,000 to $25,000,000, a gain of 34 percent. In mail orders a profit of $15,000,000 was superseded by one of $28,000,000, a gain of 84 percent.

These amazing advances during the first year of the Roosevelt administration have carried over into the present year. If we contrast the first half of 1935 with the first half of 1934, we find that the profits of the General Motors Corporation have increased 20 percent; the profits of the auto-accessory industry have gone forward 49 percent; the profits in building materials have risen 98 percent; the profits in electrical equipment have increased 112 percent; the profits in machinery are up 65 percent; the profits in textiles are 19 percent higher; the profits in merchandising have mounted 10 percent.

Nowhere in the record of business cycles do we find a parallel improvement.

Strange to relate, we hear the hue and cry that these undeniable gains have been planted in the quicksand of restricted output. The most superfluous economic analysis would reveal that no such tremendous profits could be founded upon curtailing production. What are the facts? The index of industrial production expanded from 60 in March 1933 to 87 in June 1935, while car loadings advanced from 48 to 69. Contrasted with 1,714,000 automobiles produced in the first half of 1934 there were 2,262,000 built in the first half of 1935, reflecting a gain of 32 percent. The volume of residential construction has more than doubled in 2 years. Home building is now 84 percent higher than it was 12 months ago.

RISING WAGES AND REFORMS IN WORKING CONDITIONS

What has all this meant to the average worker, the prime factor in all our industrial wealth? Long had he been shunned and neglected, his voice drowned out by the noise of the factory, always first to bear the brunt of hard times, always last to taste the fruits of prosperity. I have listened to the flimsy fiction that the recovery program has decreased employment. But when I cast my eyes at random over the universally accepted reports of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, I find that between 1933 and April 1935, to take a few representative industries, employment has increased by 117,000 in iron and steel, by 230,000 in machinery, by 285,000 in transportation equipment, by 69,000 in lumber, by 80,000 in textile fabrics, and by 54,000 in wearing apparel. Viewing the country as a whole, the consensus is that 3,500,000 men and women have regained their positions in private industry since revival commenced.

Equally encouraging have been the developments in wages. Between 1933 and 1935 the annual volume of pay rolls rose by $300,000,000 in iron and steel, by $350,000,000 in machinery, by $550,000,000 in transportation equipment, by $100,000,000 in lumber, by $150,000,000 in textile fabrics, and by $150,000,000 in wearing apparel. The total labor income of the Nation rose from $29,000,000,000 in 1933 to $33,000,000,000 in 1934, a gain of approximately $4,000,000,000.

We have carried forward an inspiring crusade for the betterment of working conditions. Child labor, at least under the industrial codes, was practically abolished. The average workweek was shortened to 37½ hours, representing a reduction of nearly 7 hours per week in industry at large. In some of the most grueling overtime occupations, the weekly curtailment totaled from 10 to 20 hours. It remains to be seen whether we shall hold these gains, or allow them to be swept away by reactionary forces.

LIBERATION FROM OPPRESSION AND FROM ECONOMIC INSECURITY

In this manner, we have set up the standards of fair play toward the worker of America. But it is neither our desire nor his that he should be merely the beneficiary of the external kindness of others. Above all, he wants to be a free man, free to participate equally in setting the conditions of work, free to affiliate with others of his kind for purposes of mutual advancement. To protect and foster these ends, the National Labor Relations Act was passed. In every industry affecting interstate commerce, the viscious "yellow dog" contract has been outlawed. The dummy union, which pretends to represent the worker while it is but the plaything of the employer, has been branded according to its true colors by Congress and ordered to dissolve. We have ordained that majority rule shall prevail in the choice of representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining, thus sounding the keynote of the same democracy in industry which we reverence in our political life. In this great endeavor, we rely upon the willing cooperation of those farsighted employers who perceive the mutual benefits of friendly industrial relations, and who realize that they must be based upon justice for all.

The quest for economic freedom has brought about the passage of the social security law. Old-age insurance and pensions will liberate the weary worker from the humiliation of charity and the frustration of dependence after a lifetime of hard work. Unemployment insurance will afford the man who loses his job through no fault of his own, a temporary haven of security while he shifts to some other occupation. As to the orphaned child, the crippled, the sick, and the blind, the Federal Government will provide subsidies setting the tempo of State responsibility throughout the Nation. The conception and inauguration of the social security law alone would have covered any administration with well-won glory. It is hard to realize that it is but one of numerous steps taken to advance the interests of the common people.

IDENTIFICATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS WITH THE COMMON GOOD

Confounded by our solid accomplishments, the opponents of reform are again crying that constitutional rights are being destroyed. The indiscriminate amplitude of these charges is in itself enough to convict the very people who utter them. If all the things were unconstitutional which they have said are unconstitutional, it would be clear that the immortal document was an insuperable barrier to providing food and clothing and shelter for millions of destitute people. Such a conclusion would be contrary to our history, alien to our law, and abhorrent to our sense of social justice.

It is true that the Supreme Court has invalidated some portions of our program. We are prepared to revere and observe every letter of these decisions. We have benefited by the severe criticism which the Court has directed against some of our legislative procedure. But we believe that the Court has merely indicated more appropriate pathways along which to pursue our humane objectives. We repudiate the argument that it ever intended to block every road to progress.

Those who throughout our history have sought to turn a constitution conceived in liberty into a handmaiden of economic slavery are now misrepresenting and misconstruing the latest decisions of the Supreme Court. They read these decisions, not as the application of legal principles to a particular set of facts but as political discourses settling for all time every major policy of the Government along the lines of their own reactionary prejudices. If the Court had decided as much as they pretend, if it had foreclosed as much of the future as they say, there would be no need for additional decisions. Thus the latitude of their interpretations tends inevitably to destroy the very Court which they pretend to revere.

But let us suppose for the sake of argument that our critics are correct when they say that some of our actions are not in accord with the Constitution's letter. The very fact that they are satisfied to make only this inquiry saddles them with a misinterpretation of the Constitution's spirit, for in closing their eyes to the further question whether the action which they condemn is imperative to promote the life, the liberty, and the happiness of our people, they have warped and twisted the theory of our Government. The United States was founded upon the proposition that where there is a conflict between a specific provision of the Constitution and the welfare of the people it is the provision and not the people that must yield. The spirit of our law is the spirit of growth.

HISTORIC FLEXIBILITY OF OUR CONSTITUTION

During every critical period in our history, the profound patriots who guided us safely through the storm regarded the Constitution as a flexible document. When the Constitutional Convention was called, the Colonies had witnessed the political and economic weaknesses flowing from the Confederation. The need was recognized for a steady and definite form of government, buttressed by a written charter. Yet temporal needs did not blind the fathers to the eternal tenets of democratic institutions.

On September 10, 1789, Alexander Hamilton, that master architect of our Federal Union, said:

An easy mode should be provided for supplying defects which will probably appear in the new system.

One week earlier James Madison had referred to the people as—

In fact, the fountain of all power * * * they could alter constitutions as they pleased.

Twenty-seven years later the newly fabricated Union had passed through the first tests of national life. Into that short period there had been packed more complex problems of tremendous import than the vision of the founders could have foreseen. It was then that Thomas Jefferson, adding the plenitude of his public experience to the native genius of his philosophical and liberal mind, said:

Laws and constitutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. As that becomes more developed, more enlightened, as new discoveries are made, new truths disclosed, and manners and opinions change with the change of circumstances, institutions must advance also and keep pace with the times. We might as well require a man to wear still the coat which fitted him as a boy, as civilized society to remain ever under the regime of our barbarous ancestors. * * * Let us, as our sister States have done, avail ourselves of our reason and experience, to correct the crude essays of our first and inexperienced, though wise, virtuous, and well-meaning counsels, and lastly, let us provide in our Constitution for its revision at stated periods.

The great sage of Monticello added:

Each generation is as independent of the one preceding as that was of all that had gone before. It has then, like them, a right to choose for itself the forms of government it believes most promotive of its own happiness * * * this corporeal globe and everything upon it belongs to its present corporeal inhabitants during their generation. They alone have the right to direct what is the concern of themselves alone, and to declare the law in that direction; and this decision can only be made by their majority.

By the middle of the nineteenth century we had pushed our boundaries westward to the Mississippi. A great cotton empire had developed in the South based upon slave labor. New industries had sprung up in the North based upon the exploitation of wage labor. Because of these two divergent lines of economic development a conflict began to brew, which in the end proved irrepressible. The bitterness of that conflict has now disappeared. The question of the balance of right and wrong is no longer of vital significance to a reunited nation. In that trying era there arose a figure whom all have come to admire. If he had had his way, there might not have been a war. If he had lived, the worst tragedies of the post-war period would have been averted. Abraham Lincoln saw with prophetic insight that the Dred Scott decision would not provide a basis for peace. Without speaking a word of disrespect for the Supreme Court, he said, shortly after that momentous decision was rendered:

The candid citizen must confess that, if the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by the decisions of the Supreme Court the instant they are made, as in ordinary litigations between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own masters, unless having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of that eminent tribunal.

Early in the present century the evil features of fully developed industrialism became rampant. Monopolies flourished. The policy of profaning the public interest gained the ascendancy. Natural resources were squandered for private gain. Studies like Sinclair's The Jungle laid bare the sordid lives of men, women, and children in factory areas. Theodore Roosevelt came upon the scene and fired the emotions and imagination of his countrymen by his awareness that new governmental devices must be framed to curb irresponsible economic power. Selfish interests at once accused him of attacking the Constitution, while short-sighted judges rendered restrictive opinions that have since been overruled. Evincing his keen grasp of social realities, Theodore Roosevelt said:

Judges and lawyers are merely instruments for procuring the right solution on certain problems with which all good citizens are equally concerned. How completely the self-styled Republican leaders have wandered today from the principles of Abraham Lincoln is shown by their refusal to apply to this question the principles which Lincoln laid down in discussing the Dred Scott decision. He scornfully refused to treat the decision of the Supreme Court in that case as permanently binding upon the people, or as a matter only for judges and lawyers; and he explicitly laid down the doctrine that the people were the masters of the court, and that it was for the people and not for the courts to determine the principles and policies in accordance with what our Constitution was to be interpreted and our Government administered.

After a brief interregnum of conservatism, Woodrow Wilson entered the White House. By this time, the abuses of industrial monopoly had been augmented by the excesses of finance capitalism. "Other people's money" became mere chips in an exclusive game played for their own advantage by the few who sat at the counting-house tables. Again the intervention of government became necessary, taking new forms to meet new circumstances. President Wilson brought to the task the mature philosophy that he had expounded 13 years earlier in Congressional Government. In that penetrating study, he had written:

The Constitution is not honored by blind worship. The more open-eyed we become, as a Nation, to its defects, and the prompter we grow in applying with unhesitating courage of convictions all thoroughly tested and well-considered expedients necessary to make self-government among us a straightforward thing or simple method, * * * the nearer will we approach to the sound sense and practical genius of the great and honorable statesmen of 1787. And the first step toward emancipation from the timidity and false pride which have led us to seek to thrive despite the defects of our national system rather than seem to deny its perfection is a fearless criticism of our system.

In some instances these great men of our past advocated constitutional amendments. More frequently they urged broader judicial interpretations of the existing document. Sometimes they recognized that what were mistakenly considered constitutional imperfections were in reality defects in contemporary statesmanship. But always they placed the welfare of the people first.

FUNDAMENTAL HUMAN ISSUES AND OUR PROGRAM FOR THE FUTURE

The fundamental issues today are not different in kind from those during prior crises in our history. These issues may be clothed in constitutional terms; but that never prevents them from being human issues, because our Constitution is a human document. Are we to exalt the human factor in industry? Is the sweatshop to remain closed? Are children to be kept at school? Are fair practices and steady profits to be preserved in industry? Is reaction or progressivism to triumph?

This practical idealism must set the pace for our endeavors when Congress meets again. In my opinion, our first step should be the enactment of a permanent Federal law regulating minimum wages and maximum hours. The National Recovery Act, with all its defects, proved this to be the appropriate approach to the weightiest problem confronting our civilization. Experience both before and after the effective application of that law has demonstrated that pure voluntarism is unavailing. Nothing shall alter our determination that neither the sweatshop days nor the pauper's pay shall have any place upon the American scene.

Our second step would be the speedy ratification of an amendment to the Federal Constitution prohibiting child labor. We have discovered during the past 2 years that the temporary abolition of this insidious practice has been economically sound. The heartless exploitation of the young is indefensible anywhere. In a country as rich as ours it is infamous.

Thirdly, the social-security program must be perfected. New methods must be devised to provide protection on a national scale against sickness and industrial accidents. The inescapable hazards of modern society are the responsibility of government.

In consolidating the gains that have been made we must not overlook the ground not yet won. A dark and terrible uncertainty envelops millions of our fellow countrymen. Recipients of relief, they have not yet been granted the right to work. Our prime task is the restoration of that right.

The fourth step in our program, therefore, should be to maintain our public-works enterprises until private business takes up the slack. I believe that no phase of public works offers larger opportunities today than the projection of low-cost housing. Such activity, inspired by the National Government but designed to release the springs of private capital as well, and combining centralized inspiration with decentralized administration, ought to be commenced at once. Nothing quickens the imagination and fires the intellect more than the thought of bringing space and sanitation into the dreary lives of those who now inhabit the slums.

With returning prosperity we shall not sink again into the ignoble ease or snug self-satisfaction that neglects the major part of our population. We shall not listen again to the conflicting councils of those whose mistakes in government transformed a heritage of prosperity into a legacy of misery and depression; those from whose palsied hands we snatched the sagging torch of our national well-being and raised it again on high. Our one answer to them is: Compare the condition in which you left the country with the position to which we have lifted it.

Inspired by the magnificent example of a great President, we are pledged to push forward to goals not yet attained but clearly within our reach if the wealth and genius and spirit of our people remain enlisted in the cause.

COLLECTION OF PROCESSING TAXES IN UNITED STATES POSSESSIONS

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 2652 be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the Senate bill 2652.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator briefly explain what the House amendment is?

Mr. SMITH. The bill attaches certain possessions of the United States to internal-revenue collection districts in connection with the collection of processing taxes under the A. A. A. Act.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understood that the bill as originally passed by the Senate simply included certain of our possessions in certain internal-revenue districts.

Mr. SMITH. This is just defining those districts.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask what the House amendment was?

Mr. SMITH. The House amendment limits the purposes of the bill to the collection of taxes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the House will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In line 10, it is proposed to strike out the words "insofar as they have become applicable" and to insert "with respect to the collection of taxes", so as to read:

> The President is authorized to attach by Executive order any or all of such possessions to any internal-revenue collection district for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title with respect to the collection of taxes.

Mr. SMITH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF INFLAMMABLES

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate passed a bill providing for inspection and regulation of vessels engaged in the transportation of inflammables. It seems that the House had already passed a bill of similar import. Accordingly I ask that the vote by which Senate bill 2005 was passed may be reconsidered and that House bill 8598 may be substituted therefor and considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 8598) to provide for the inspection and regulation of vessels engaged in the transportation of inflammable, explosive, and like dangerous cargoes in navigable waters of the United States was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That no vessel, regardless of size or rig, excepting public vessels of the United States, shall transport on the navigable waters of the United States, from point to point in the continental United States, any inflammable, explosive, or like dangerous cargo or anchor in such waters or go into drydock for repairs while having on board such dangerous cargo, until such vessel has been inspected by the board of local inspectors to determine that such cargo may be carried on such vessel with safety, and a permit issued to her for the presence on board of such cargo, which permit shall be framed under glass and posted in a conspicuous part of the vessel.
> The Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to promulgate rules and regulations concerning construction, the appliances, and apparatus for stowage of vessels used in the transportation of inflammable, explosive, or like dangerous cargo on said vessels in order to preserve life and property while in operation or at anchor. The local board of inspectors shall not issue a permit to any vessel until it finds that said vessel is in substantial compliance with the rules and regulations promulgated by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That this act shall not apply to a vessel covered by an unexpired certificate of inspection duly issued in accordance with law by the local inspectors of the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation or, if a foreign vessel, by an unexpired certificate of inspection issued under the authority of its own government and recognized under law or treaty by the Government of the United States.
> SEC. 2. A penalty of not to exceed $500 may be imposed for each violation of any of the provisions of this act or of any of the rules and regulations promulgated under the authority of this act. The vessel shall be liable for the said penalty and may be seized and proceeded against, by way of libel, in the District Court of the United States for any district within which such vessel may be found.
> SEC. 3. This act shall become effective 60 days after its enactment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 2005, of similar title, will be indefinitely postponed.

FALSE BILLING OF ARTICLES SHIPPED BY WATER

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, from the Committee on Commerce, I report an original bill which has been passed upon by the committee and recommended by the Department. It is the bill (S. 3467) amending the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, and it provides that the provisions of the law applying to false billing of articles sent by land shall be applied to false billing in shipping by water, and ask that it be given immediate consideration.

Senate bill 3467 was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair inquires if this is a new bill.

Mr. COPELAND. It is a new bill, but it is very desirable to have action by the House. That is the reason why I am doing the unusual thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the Senator from New York to postpone the request for a little while.

Mr. COPELAND. I may say to the Chair that the bill applies exactly the same principles to false billing of materials sent by water that now apply to false billing of articles sent by land. It is a proper bill, and I hope the Chair will permit it to be given consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the Senator to let it go over temporarily.

FARM-MORTGAGE RELIEF

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3002) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, which was, on page 8, line 23, to strike out all after "court" down to and including "may", in line 24, and insert "shall."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the amendment?

Mr. BORAH. The amendment is to strike out after the word "court", in line 23, on page 8, the words "in its discretion, if it deems it for the best interests of the secured creditors and debtor, may."

This would make it read:

Provided, That upon request in writing by any secured creditor or creditors, the court shall order the property upon which such secured creditors have a lien to be sold at public auction.

Mr. ROBINSON. It deprives the court of discretion and makes the provision mandatory?

Mr. BORAH. That is the effect of the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Idaho.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3210) to refer the claim of the Menominee Tribe of Indians to the Court of Claims with the absolute right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4324) to carry out certain obligations under certain tribal agreements.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2215) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection and publication of statistics of tobacco by the Department of Agriculture", approved January 14, 1929, as amended.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CAPPER obtained the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold that momentarily, I desire to enter a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2665) to change the name of the Department of the Interior and to coordinate certain governmental functions. I desire to enter the motion so I may pursue the proper course. If the program, as I understand now, is that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] is to have the floor by previous arrangement, I do not wish to take him from the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Illinois that a motion has been made by the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL] to proceed to the consideration of a certain bill. That motion is the pending question, and so long as it remains undisposed of, the motion of the Senator from Illinois to take up another measure is not in order.

Mr. LEWIS. I give notice that I shall move to have considered Senate bill 2665.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I withdraw the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the measure which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] wishes to bring up after the pending matter shall have been disposed of, but may I call his attention to the fact that yesterday I moved to take up a bill which I believe has been reported unanimously by the Judiciary Committee without amendment. At that time there was only one objection to it and then only for the purpose of offering an amendment. I hope the Senator will permit me to have the bill considered and disposed of, as I think it will take only 3 or 4 minutes.

In view of that situation I hope the Senator will not take it as a personal matter if I try to get recognition of the Chair at the time he does at the conclusion of the pending matter.

Mr. LEWIS. I understand the position of the Senator from Maryland, and I hope he will not take it as personal if he finds I contest his request.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. There are certain rules which govern this body even though at times they are seemingly ignored or disregarded. However, I am not going to agree to any allotting of time to anyone. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Logan	Robinson
Ashurst	Costigan	Lonergan	Russell
Austin	Davis	Long	Schall
Bachman	Dieterich	McAdoo	Schwellenbach

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], who are necessarily detained.

I also announce that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] is absent from the city.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3434.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR DISTRICT OF KANSAS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I rise to protest with all the earnestness I possess against jamming through, in this preadjournment period, a bill creating a new Federal judge for the State of Kansas. The opposition to the measure is so overwhelming in my State, and the proposed legislation is so vitally important to the people of the State, that I ask the privilege of making a statement in opposition to the pending motion.

I trust that my distinguished colleague from Kansas will not insist upon his motion to take up at this time Senate bill 3434, which would provide for the appointment of an additional judge for the district of Kansas. In fact, I am somewhat surprised that such a measure ever was introduced; certainly surprised that a serious attempt should be made to have it enacted into law.

Mr. President, there is no need for an additional district judge in Kansas. As I see it, there is not even any reasonable excuse for creating this additional office in Kansas. Kansas has no more need of an additional Federal district judge than it has for two Governors, or for a second State supreme court. I believe the records of the district court will show this statement to be correct.

When this measure, somewhat to my surprise, was reported by the Judiciary Committee, I sent for a copy of the report. At this point I also wish to protest against the manner in which the bill has been handled. With no desire to criticize the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], I do feel compelled to say that I feel I have not been treated fairly by his committee.

I had known that such a measure was in contemplation. In fact, it may be remembered that some time ago the Senate recommitted to the Judiciary Committee a bill providing for additional judges in New York and some other States, additional judges for Kansas and Missouri having been added to the original committee bill. It was pointed out at the time that there was no showing of the necessity for these additional judges.

Several times I have called attention of the distinguished Chairman of the Judiciary Committee to the fact of my interest in this proposal. Having reminded him of this fact, I naturally supposed that if such a measure should be proposed I would be given an opportunity to appear before the committee and express to the committee the views of the people of Kansas, as I understood these views.

I was not notified, however, when this bill came before the committee. I had no means of knowing such a bill was before the committee. The first I knew of Senate bill 3434 was when a report was presented to the Senate, recommending that Senate bill 3434 be passed. The records show that the measure was introduced in the Senate and the report filed on the same day, almost within the same hour. I still believe ordinary courtesy, under the circumstances, entitled me at least to a hearing before the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. President, the people of Kansas do not desire this additional judge, as I expect to show by reading to the Senate numerous letters and telegrams I received when the proposal was made earlier in the session through an amendment to another bill. At the very least, the people of my State are entitled to a hearing before the committee before a measure of this importance to them and to their children is reported to the Senate for action.

Passing over that phase of the matter, I now come to the report accompanying Senate bill 3434. Naturally I had supposed that the report would at least attempt to justify the creation of this additional office, with necessary help and quarters and expenses for traveling and maintenance, and the saddling of this expense upon the taxpayers.

Imagine my surprise when I read the report and found that no effort at all was made to justify the passage of the bill. I will read the report to the Senate. It consists of just one sentence, as follows:

> The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3434) to provide for the appointment of one additional judge for the District Court of the United States for the District of Kansas, after consideration thereof, report the bill favorably, without amendment, with the recommendation that it be passed.

Mr. President, that is all there is in the report of the committee. I confess there is one clause in it that I do not understand. The report says, and I quote, "after consideration thereof." Mr. President, in view of the fact that the bill was not introduced until just before the report was made, I am unable to understand whether that "after consideration thereof" is a subtle attempt at humor, or if it intends to convey the impression that the bill was given serious consideration in committee.

But, Mr. President, I believe I can explain to the Senate why the committee report of just one sentence does not give any reasons why the additional judge is desired. There is no report from the Department of Justice recommending the appointment of an additional judge mentioned in the report of the committee. If there is any such report from the Department I confess I never have heard of it.

Mr. President, there may be reason for that absurd report to the Senate—absurd because a committee report is supposed to inform the Senate why the legislation proposed is necessary, or at least why it is desirable. I have before me a statement and accompanying chart from the clerk of the district court, showing the condition of the docket of the Kansas court.

Let me say at this point, Mr. President, that I should much have preferred to present this information first to the Committee on the Judiciary. The members of that committee were entitled, are entitled, to consider these facts before reporting on the measure at all. At this point I appeal to my colleague from Kansas to ask that this bill be sent back to committee for the purpose of holding a hearing, or at least allowing me to come before the committee and present these facts in regard to the docket.

It is not fair to the Senate, in these few hours before the adjournment of this session of Congress, to take up the time of the Senate in considering matters that should first be presented to a Senate committee, and thoroughly considered there. I will say to my colleague, however, that if and when these facts are presented to the committee, the chances are that the committee will refuse to recommend the bill for passage. Nevertheless, I suggest to my Kansas colleague that he adopt this suggestion, and allow the bill to be handled in orderly legislative fashion.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 3434 be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary for further consideration.

Mr. McGILL. I object.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think it was the intention of the Senator to enter a motion.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have not made a motion. I have not as yet completed my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Kansas to ask unanimous consent that the bill be recommitted.

Mr. CAPPER. I still have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator still has the floor.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the satisfactory condition of the docket of the district court of Kansas. Accompanying the charts to which I referred is the following statement from W. G. West, the clerk of the district court of Kansas. He says:

> The number of bankruptcy cases filed during the fiscal year 1934 was 719, a less number than any year since 1930; there is a gradual reduction in number since the peak year of 1932.

I call special attention to the fact that the number of bankruptcy cases filed is decreasing; it is more likely to continue decreasing than increasing, with the return of measurable prosperity. So an additional judge is not needed to handle bankruptcy cases—even if more cases were being filed, they could be handled by an additional commissioner. It is not necessary to name an additional judge.

Now, let us see about private suits. Again I quote from the statement of the clerk of the district court:

> Private suits filed during the fiscal year of 1934 were 291, which is a lesser number than any year since 1930, and also a lesser number than any other fiscal year during the 10-year period, with the exception of 1927, 1929, and 1930.

The number of private suits filed is growing less instead of greater, Mr. President. So there seems to be no need of an additional judge to handle private suits. Now, let us see about civil cases. The clerk of the court reports, and I quote:

> The number of civil cases filed during the fiscal year 1934 was 91, which was less than any other year during the 10-year period.

Now, I submit to the Senate an additional judge should not be appointed to handle civil cases, with the number less than at any time in the past 10 years. Again, I quote from the summary made by the clerk of the district court:

> The number of criminal cases filed during the fiscal year 1934 was 64; this number, likewise, is materially lower than any other fiscal year during the 10-year period.

The number of criminal cases, civil cases, private suits, bankruptcy cases—all less than in preceding years. In God's name, Mr. President, what do we need of an additional judge to handle a decreasing volume of business?

Perhaps I am not surprised that the committee report gives no reasons for an additional judge. It is very apparent there are no reasons for this additional judge; at least none that could go into a committee report.

But I find another sentence in the statement of the clerk of the court, to which I should like to direct the attention of my colleagues in the Senate, including my distinguished colleague from Kansas. The clerk notes, and again I quote:

This chart shows a gradual reduction in the amount of business in the United States District Court of Kansas, and emphasizes the fact there is no necessity for an additional judge in the Kansas district.

What I have so far covered, Mr. President, deals merely with new business before the court. Now, I want to place in the RECORD a few figures as to pending cases on the docket, taken from the statistical reports to the Department of Justice, covering fiscal years ending June 30:

At the close of the fiscal year 1932, there were 818 law and equity cases, both private and United States, pending; at the close of the fiscal year 1934, there were only 618 cases pending. The number of law and equity cases before the court was 200 less in 1934 than in 1932.

That, Mr. President, certainly does not indicate the need of an additional judge.

The number of pending private cases, both law and equity, was 694 at the end of the fiscal year 1932; there were only 377 such cases pending at the end of 1934—a decrease of 40 percent. Why another judge?

Mr. President, I want to call attention also to the number of criminal cases pending. At the close of the fiscal year 1932 there were 533 criminal cases pending; 2 years later, at the close of 1934, there were just 80 cases pending.

Now, Mr. President, I submit in all seriousness that when the number of criminal cases brought is the lowest in 10 years, when the number of criminal cases pending has been reduced from 533 to 80, there can be no reason for urging the naming of an additional judge to handle criminal cases in the Kansas district court.

Now the number of United States cases pending, both law and equity, shows an increase from 124 to 241; but that is more than offset by the decrease in private cases, both law and equity. Also, the number of bankruptcy cases pending increased from 950 to 1,438; but, as everyone knows, these do not take much time of the court, being handled by commissioners. Name an extra commissioner, if necessary, but not an additional judge, whose principal duty in connection with bankruptcy cases would be to name a commissioner. And besides, as noted before, the number of bankruptcy cases filed seems to be on the wane, and all of us hope these will still further decrease as prosperity returns to the agricultural regions of the United States.

Mr. President, there is another point to which I desire to call attention of the majority Members of the Senate. There is a strong feeling in my State—and, I might say, all over the country—that this administration has created too many new jobs; has added unnecessarily to the number of officials and employees on Federal pay rolls.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is the Senator in a position to answer whether or not he feels that the A. A. A. has more employees than it needs in order to operate?

Mr. CAPPER. There are no doubt some departments of the Government where it has been necessary to have additional employees. The A. A. A. is engaged in work which is helpful to the farmers in the West. It is probably one department which requires additional employees.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator does not think that the A. A. A. has more employees than it needs at the present time?

Mr. CAPPER. I am not fully informed in regard to that.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am interested in what the Senator is saying, and I was wondering whether he would designate those departments or agencies which he thinks have more employees than they need.

Mr. CAPPER. I have not attempted to go into that in detail, but it is a fact that the people of this country generally are protesting in a most emphatic manner against the very rapidly increasing number of employees on the Federal pay roll.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator's observation is correct, but it strikes me it is only fair in such protests to tell where the extra employees are, so that we may get at them. Just as in the case of any other protest that is not based on fact or suggestion, such a protest is not worth while. It may be that in the A. A. A. they are working with a very limited number of employees in spite of the fact that they have a large personnel. That is something about which I do not know, but I should be interested in having a little more detailed information, not only about the A. A. A. but about other agencies. I do not think it quite fair to make the observation without pointing out wherein the observation is accurate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest, in answer to the criticism of the Senator from Maryland, which I am inclined to think is a just and fair one, that the Senator from Kansas is doing now just exactly what the Senator from Maryland has suggested, except that he has not covered all the field. As I understand his argument, he is pointing out that in the judiciary field, at least, too many judges are being appointed, and he is giving statistics from the court in Kansas which bear out his argument, I think, that too many judges are being appointed where judges should not be appointed.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator is making out a good case from his point of view in that regard. It was only because I considered that his remarks went out of the field of the judiciary that I was anxious to have him submit the facts upon which his statement was based.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator's anxiety about other things is perfectly proper, although, in my judgment, the Senator from Kansas, whom he is interrogating, is carrying out the very kind of argument the Senator from Maryland suggests except that he does not cover the entire field.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, there is some argument about the matter of the temporary jobs and positions created. The relief and recovery program, the distresses of the depression, may justify the appointment of many of the thousands of extra persons placed on the pay rolls in the past few years.

But here is proposed the creation of an additional judgeship, which the great majority of the people of Kansas, which the Bar of Kansas know to be unnecessary. It would create another lifetime job, call for more clerical help, for more maintenance expenditures.

The creation of this additional office, Mr. President, will do as much as anything I can imagine at this moment to convince the people of Kansas that this administration, this Congress, has lost its sense of duty to protect the taxpayers of the Nation against unwarranted drains on the Treasury.

It will be cited for years to come as a glaring example of extravagance, of the creation of useless jobs. Passage of this measure will be a most serious mistake.

Mr. President, as I stated before, this information is information that should have been considered by the Judiciary Committee before the measure came to the floor of the Senate. I deeply regret the necessity at this time, with only a few hours of the session remaining, of taking up the valuable time of Senators presenting information which it never should have been necessary to bring to the Senate at all.

However, under the circumstances, and in justice to the people of Kansas, I feel constrained to present these facts to the Senate, in order that it may have adequate information upon which to base its decision.

Therefore, Mr. President, I feel it necessary at this time to read to the Senate a report made to me by the clerk of the district court last March, when I was informed there would be an effort made to name an additional and unnecessary district judge in Kansas. All this information I should have been glad, in fact, was very anxious, to present to the Judiciary Committee. It never entered my mind that the committee would report out such a measure without affording an opportunity to present this information to the committee.

Here is what the clerk informs me is the status of his office at this time:

Enclosed please find chart showing cases filed in the United States District Court for the District of Kansas over a 10-year period from 1925 to 1934, inclusive.

You will note that the number of bankruptcy cases filed during the fiscal year 1934 was 719, a less number filed than any year since 1930; there is a gradual reduction in number since the peak year of 1932.

Private suits filed during the fiscal year of 1934 were 291, which is a lesser number than any year since 1930, and also a lesser number than any other fiscal year during the 10-year period with the exception of 1927, 1929, and 1930.

The number of civil cases filed during the fiscal year 1934 was 91, which was less than any other year during the 10-year period.

The number of criminal cases filed during the fiscal year of 1934 was 64; this number likewise is materially lower than any other fiscal year during the 10-year period.

This chart shows a gradual reduction in the amount of business in the United States District Court of Kansas and emphasizes the fact that there is no necessity for an additional judge in the Kansas district. If there is any further information which you would like from this office, kindly advise.

I read another letter which I have received from the same clerk, as follows:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
Topeka, Kans., March 23, 1935.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: A comparison of the business of the United States District Court for the District of Kansas over a period of the past 4 fiscal years reveals the fact that the work is being well taken care of and that there is a less number of trial cases pending now than in any other year since 1931.

At each and every term of court special effort is made to have attorneys ready with their cases. Mimeographed copies of the dockets in the respective divisions are mailed to all attorneys of record 3 weeks in advance of the time court convenes. Upon the front pages of the docket attorneys are urged to be ready for trial when their cases are called. In addition, special letters have been mailed attorneys urging disposition of pending cases. When cases are continued it is because attorneys are not ready and not because the judge cannot hear them. To my knowledge there are no cases pending for 6 months or longer which the court has been unable to hear, and in all cases where circumstances require a special hearing the time of the court has permitted that to be done.

The number of law, equity, and criminal cases pending shows a decrease at the close of the fiscal year of 1934 over the corresponding period of 1931. It is a fact that a very small amount of the judge's time is taken up with bankruptcy matters. Such cases are referred to referees and are handled almost entirely in a routine and formal manner as far as the judge is concerned. Lawyers have advised that fully 80 percent of farm debtor cases are awaiting outcome of appeal upon either constitutional or law questions. Probably two-thirds of all pending equity cases are foreclosure suits which require very little of the judge's attention, being disposed of in a formal manner. The majority of Government law cases pending are war-risk cases, most of which have been delayed by either the plaintiffs or by the Government because of the necessity for further investigation. Often war-risk cases have been filed by attorneys in order to give their clients protection under the time-limit benefits provided by statute. Pleas of guilty dispose of approximately 75 percent of all criminal cases.

The following data have been taken from the clerk's statistical reports to the Department of Justice covering fiscal years ending June 30:

	Pending bankruptcy	Pending law and equity, both private and United States	Pending United States cases, both law and equity	Pending private, both law and equity	Pending criminal
1931	814	658	118	540	355
1932	950	818	124	694	533
1933	1,205	878	156	622	267
1934	1,438	618	241	377	80

The above tabulation shows an improvement in the amount of business before the court, and indicates only a normal condition on June 30, 1934.

The annual report of the Attorney General of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, shows the number of private suits, civil, and criminal cases pending in 47 of the judicial districts to be as follows:

This tabulation further shows that the number of pending civil and private suits in the Kansas district compares favorably with most of those herein listed.

I hope this information may be of help to you in establishing the fact that there is no necessity for adding another judge to the Kansas district. If you wish any additional information, please advise.

With kindest regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,

W. G. WEST, Clerk.

Mr. President, I have some other letters from the clerk of the district court bearing on this matter; also, many letters and telegrams from Kansas citizens protesting against the appointment of an additional judge for the district of Kansas. I will now proceed to read these letters in order that the Senate may know the situation. Again I desire to apologize to the Senate, and to my distinguished colleague from Kansas, for taking up so much time on this matter. I should much prefer to present these letters to the Judiciary Committee. Again I desire to express my disappointment that my distinguished colleague and the committee did not see fit to allow me to appear before the committee, thereby saving a great amount of time; thereby also, as I see it, treating the people of Kansas and myself with the courtesy and justice to which I feel we were entitled in this matter so vitally concerning the standing of the judiciary in our State.

I will now read a letter I have from Judge Lawrence F. Day, a judge of the second judicial district, who resides at Atchison, Kans. The letter is addressed to me, and is written to me voluntarily. No letter I am about to read to the Senate was solicited by me. I read:

Understand there is some sort of a movement on foot that would lead to the appointment of a third judge of the United States District Court for the District of Kansas.

I do not know how far this movement has progressed, or whether it is even being considered seriously.

We Kansas people consider it a joke, as a third judge is unnecessary and not needed to handle the amount of business transacted in our Federal court.

Our two judges are sufficient and promptly take care of any litigation pending before them. An appointment of another judge would certainly be a waste of money.

I hope that you will not be in favor of such a measure.

I now read a letter from Hon. Fred R. Smith, Manhattan, Kans., who for many years was one of the prominent district judges of the State of Kansas. He addresses to me this letter voluntarily. He is recognized as one of the leading lawyers of northeast Kansas. He writes:

In respect to the move which is being made at the present time to redistrict the State of Kansas and appoint another United States district judge I wish to state that I can see no good reason for the expenditure by the Government for the amount of money, which would be considerable, to administer the affairs of another United States district judgeship.

As a lawyer who has had some practice before the United States District Court of our State, I am not aware that the docket of the United States District Court in this State has been so large so that the present judge occupying the same is behind in his work to such an extent that a demand of this kind is at all urgent. I think the lawyers generally in this State agree with me that there is no occasion for the creation of another district judgeship.

I trust, therefore, that you will do whatever you can to oppose any measure of this kind, as we are already so seriously burdened with taxes that economy demands retrenchment in this respect wherever possible.

You will no doubt remember me as the former district judge from the twenty-first judicial district of Kansas.

I have here resolutions adopted by the Wyandotte County Bar Association signed by Errett P. Scrivner, secretary, and Russell L. Stephens, president of the Wyandotte County Bar Association. The resolutions are as follows:

That whereas a committee composed of the members of the Wyandotte County (Kans.) Bar Association has been appointed for the purpose of determining the necessity of creation of an additional United States district judgeship in the district of Kansas; and

Whereas the committee so appointed met pursuant to the call of the chairman, E. S. McAnany, thereof; and

Whereas said committee made thorough investigation of all available data and information relative thereto which data consisted of the clerk's statistical reports to the Department of Justice covering the fiscal years ending June 30, 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, and 1934 and data taken from the Annual Report of the Attorney General of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, showing the number of private suits, civil and criminal cases pending in 47 of the judicial districts; and

Whereas said committee after mature deliberation and consideration of the foregoing data and information determined that no necessity existed for the creation of an additional judgeship in the district of Kansas nor for the appointment of an additional judge in that district; and

Whereas said committee recommended that the Wyandotte County (Kans.) Bar Association go on record as opposed to the legislation proposed to be adopted for the creation of an additional judgeship in the district of Kansas and for the appointment of an additional judge in that district; and

Whereas at a special meeting of the Wyandotte County (Kans.) Bar Association held at the Grund Hotel at Kansas City, Kans., on Monday evening April 15, 1935, said special meeting having been called for the purpose of considering the question of the necessity of an additional United States district judgeship for the district of Kansas; and

Whereas at said special meeting it was voted by a majority of the members of the Wyandotte County (Kans.) Bar Association present that the recommendation of the committee be adopted and made the action of said association and that a resolution relating thereto be drafted by the president and secretary and forwarded to the Attorney General of the United States, and the Representatives of the State of Kansas in the United States Senate and United States House of Representatives: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the recommendation of the committee be adopted as the action of the Wyandotte County (Kans.) Bar Association; and be it further

Resolved, That the Wyandotte County (Kans.) Bar Association place itself on record as opposed to the proposed legislation; and be it still further

Resolved, That the president and secretary of the Wyandotte County (Kans.) Bar Association be directed to forward copies of this resolution to the Attorney General of the United States and to the Representatives of the State of Kansas in the United States Senate and United States House of Representatives.

Dated at Kansas City, Kans., this 15th day of April 1935.

ERRETT P. SCRIVNER,
Secretary Wyandotte County (Kans.) Bar Association.
RUSSELL L. STEPHENS,
President Wyandotte County (Kans.) Bar Association.

I have also a letter from State Senator Fred M. Harris, who has been president of the Kansas State Bar Association, recognized as one of the foremost attorneys of the State. He addresses me this letter:

I understand there is a bill pending before Congress introduced by Senator MCGILL—

At that time there was no bill pending, by the way. I continue reading:

creating another division of the United States District Court in the State of Kansas. I have been informed that you have stated that you cannot see the necessity for the creation of another division of this court, and that you are opposed to the bill.

I hope very much that this is true. As one who has practiced law in Kansas for a long time, I can see no justification for the creation of this division, or the incurring of the expense which it will entail. I am very sure that the court as it is now conducted is taking care of all work which comes before it satisfactorily, and there is no reason for the creation of another division.

I have never heard of any complaints concerning any delays in the functions of the Federal Court in this State, and in fact I know from experience that most of our courts, both Federal and State, in States like Kansas, are amply able to care promptly for all of the litigation pending before them, and that what material delay there is comes from the actions of litigants or counsel, and is not the fault of the courts.

I have here a statement from the Allen County Bar Association, as follows:

We, the undersigned, practicing attorneys of the Allen County Bar, having been informed through the newspapers that there is a bill pending in Congress to establish an additional judge of the United States District Court in Kansas, beg leave to state that from our experience, practice, and observation of the United States District Court in the State of Kansas, we have not had any trouble or delay in getting cases or matters heard in said court and have found that the present judges of said court have and are keeping the work of their docket up to date, and that there is no unusual congestion or delay concerning matters pending in said court and it is our honest opinion and we feel that the above law to establish another United States district judge in Kansas should not as a matter of economy be enacted in a law at this time.

I next read a letter from Judge Hugo T. Wedell, of Chanute. The letter was written some months ago, before he was appointed to the Kansas State Supreme Court to fill a vacancy. He says:

From what I have been able to gather, the appointment of such a judge at this time is entirely unnecessary. The Federal court docket in this State, I am advised, is more nearly up to date than it has been in years, and that cases are being tried as fast as litigants and attorneys are requesting.

I next read a letter from Forrest D. Smythe, Special Assistant Attorney General, as follows:

I wish to enter my protest against the bill that is now pending for the creation of a new judgeship, as the information that I have received is to the effect that the same is unnecessary and there exists no emergency which would warrant such creation.

Here is a letter from William E. Smith, a prominent lawyer of Wamego, Kans., which reads:

I have noticed in our daily papers that there is quite an agitation going on in our State in certain localities for the creation of another United States district judge. I am sure upon investigation that the concensus of opinion of lawyers, litigants, and business men in Kansas is against the appointment of another judge, because there is no necessity of it; and, furthermore, we do not want the additional expense of $25,000 or $30,000 which it would incur. I have talked with many lawyers and many merchants, and they all say "no."

I have had a great deal of work in the United States district court at Topeka, going on 2 years, and I have no complaint whatever to make, because my work has been handled expeditiously without any delay whatever.

I have a letter here from Senator W. E. Archer, of Hiawatha, Kans., one of the leading lawyers of the State, in which he says:

I am informed there is a suggestion in Washington that we have another United States district judge. I see no reason for the appointment of another judge for this district. We have two now. You know Judge Hopkins is a good, industrious judge. He keeps up with the docket. Whatever delay there is, in the trying of cases, is occasioned by the attorneys and not by Judge Hopkins. I have heard of no complaints from members of the bar about their inability to get cases tried. I wish you could see your way clear, under the circumstances, to oppose appointment or provision for another judge of this district.

I next read a telegram from E. H. Rees, of Emporia, a leading lawyer there, who says:

As a member of the bar, as senator from this district, and as a citizen of the State, I am opposed to any measure providing for additional Federal judge in this State. It is unnecessary, uncalled for, and I commend you in your action opposing such measure.

I have a telegram from Hal E. Harlan, of Manhattan, Kans., one of the prominent attorneys of the State, in which he says:

Federal docket in good shape in Kansas. See no occasion for additional Federal judge.

Hon. Kirke W. Dale, of Arkansas City, a prominent lawyer there, writes as follows:

Personally, I feel that the situation at this time does not warrant a new district and a new judge. There is not sufficient business in the State to warrant two judges, and, as a matter of fact, Judge Hopkins has made an excellent record keeping the docket to date. There are very few cases, if any, in which demand is being made for trial, and Judge Hopkins has given everyone who so desired an opportunity to try their cases.

I next quote from a letter from John B. Markham, of Parsons, Kans.:

I wish to go on record as being against such a measure, and wish to urge you to cast your vote against this bill for the reason that the present United States district judges are ably handling all matters in their courts, and it would be a needless expense for the appointment of a third judge.

George R. Lehmberg, of MacPherson, Kans., writes as follows:

We have discussed this matter with most of the members of the local bar, but we have not taken any action as a bar association on this bill. Most of the lawyers here do not see any need of another Federal judge at this time. Some of them state that they have not formed an opinion at this time. We personally feel that Judge Hopkins is attending to the matters before him on the bench in a manner so as to keep the docket up to date, and as long as that is being done we feel no special need of another Federal judge.

I could continue reading any number of letters of the same tenor, and I will read a few more.

Here is one from Z. C. Millikin, of Salina, Kans., in which he says:

Just why another judge should be appointed for Kansas is not apparent; the business does not justify it. I hope you will oppose this appointment.

Here is a letter from the mayor of Erie, Kans., C. E. Locke, in which he says:

I wish to take this opportunity to express approval of your attitude in opposition to the creation of a new Federal judge, and to encourage you to continue in your resistance to such unwarranted maneuvers. We all know that the present organization of the Federal court in this State is adequate to all needs.

J. M. Hewitt, a lawyer of Oswego, Kans., writes as follows:

There is no necessity for creating a new Federal judgeship, and your continued opposition to this bill will meet with general approval.

I next read a letter from O. Renn, an attorney of Arkansas City, Kans.:

I am writing you to express my appreciation of your attitude with reference to opposing the appointment of another Federal district judge in the State of Kansas.

You should be commended upon this action for the reasons that the two Federal district judges we have in Kansas at the present time can amply take care of all the business that is to come before this court in Kansas, and another judge would be an extravagance and an expenditure that the people of Kansas should not stand for. It will cause criticism if it is not done—and rightly so.

Arthur F. McCarty, one of the leading lawyers of Salina, Kans., writes as follows:

Considerable familiarity with the business of the Federal court in this district leads me to express the opinion that there is not the slightest need now, nor is there likely to be in the near future, for another judge.

There has been no difficulty keeping up with litigation in the Federal court, and the dockets are, and have been for years, well cleared.

I am sure that the majority of lawyers in Kansas who have business in the Federal court will endorse this view.

I believe, therefore, that in the interest of economy as well as efficiency that the bill should be defeated, and trust you will vote against it if it be reported for passage.

I next read a letter from W. B. Crowther, attorney for the State tax commission:

I hope you will oppose the appointment of another Federal district judge for Kansas. I happen to know that there is no occasion for the appointment of another judge at this time, and it seems to me that it would be too bad to add the expense of an additional judge at this time.

I have here a letter from Roscoe W. Graves, an attorney of Emporia, Kans., in which he says:

There is considerable interest among members of the Kansas bar relative to the proposed legislation to create another Federal judgeship in Kansas. While I do not have a great amount of Federal practice, I suppose I have about what the average noncorporation attorney enjoys, and it is my belief that there are many things that Kansas needs more than another Federal judge. In fact, Kansas does not need another Federal judge. The work in our Federal court is not far behind, and I cannot help but feel that this propcsed act is entirely unjustified.

From a letter from Senator Simeon Webb, of Pittsburg, Kans., I read the following:

I understand there is an attempt being made in Washington to try to establish the need for an additional Federal judge in Kansas. I think my practice in the Federal courts is sufficient for me to be able to make the statement that litigants in the District Court of the United States for Kansas are not being delayed in the settlement of lawsuits; in fact, the bar seems to be more inclined to the idea that the judge sets the matters down too soon rather than postponing them. I therefore wish to endorse your stand also on this matter in your efforts to keep another Federal judge from being appointed in Kansas.

(At this point Mr. CAPPER yielded to Mr. NEELY to present the conference report on House bill 9100, which appears under the appropriate heading.)

Mr. CAPPER. I have a letter from A. K. Barton, a prominent attorney of Kansas, in which he says:

The matter of creating another Federal judge for Kansas, as contemplated in Washington, is simply a political move. It is not needed, therefore useless. Congress is unable to balance the Budget, the Treasury Department is periodically issuing bonds, so it seems to me it is a crime to load the taxpayers with another set of useless high-salaried officials.

Mr. President, I have here a hundred or more similar letters in protest, most of them from lawyers, which I shall not detain the Senate to read.

I hope my colleague will consent to have the bill returned to the committee for the consideration which it should have. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, there is a motion pending. Is the motion of my colleague in order at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the motion of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] is not in order at this time, as the Senate has not yet disposed of the motion of the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL]. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the junior Senator from Kansas to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3434.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask for yeas and nays.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, if there is any question about the right to take up the bill and have it considered, I am ready to answer the argument submitted by my colleague. I do not care to do that if the bill may be taken up as bills usually are in this body. I am willing to have a vote on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. MCGILL] has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3434. On this motion the yeas and nays have been demanded. Is the demand seconded? Apparently a sufficient number second the demand. The yeas and nays are ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BULKLEY. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who is necessarily absent from the city. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. NYE (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. NYE. Having a general pair with that Senator and not knowing how he would vote if present, I am of necessity compelled to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announces his pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], transfers that pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], and votes "yea."

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the following-named Senators are unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire to announce the following general pairs.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], and

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY].

The result was announced—yeas 55, nays 19, as follows:

STABILIZATION OF BITUMINOUS COAL-MINING INDUSTRY—CONFERENCE REPORT

During the delivery of Mr. CAPPER'S speech,

Mr. NEELY. I present the conference report on House bill 9100 and move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9100) to stabilize the bituminous coal-mining industry and promote its interstate commerce; to provide for cooperative marketing of bituminous coal; to levy a tax on bituminous coal and provide for a drawback under certain conditions; to declare the production, distribution, and use of bituminous coal to be affected with a national public interest; to conserve the bituminous coal resources of the United States; to provide for the general welfare, and for other purposes; and providing penalties, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 21.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 22, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 20: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"It shall not be an unfair method of competition or a violation of the code or any requirement of this act (1) to sell to or through any bona fide and legitimate farmer's cooperative organization duly organized under the laws of any State, Territory, the District of Columbia, or the United States whether or not such organization grants rebates, discounts, patronage dividends, or other similar benefits to its members, (2) to sell through any intervening agency to any such cooperative organization, or (3) to pay or allow to any such cooperative organization or to any such intervening agency any discount, commission, rebate, or dividend ordinarily paid or allowed, or permitted by the code to be paid or allowed, to other purchasers for purchases in wholesale or middleman quantities."

And the Senate agree to the same.

M. M. NEELY,
ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
JAMES J. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAMUEL B. HILL,
DAVID J. LEWIS,
FRED M. VINSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, what conference report is that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the conference report on the so-called "Guffey coal bill."

Mr. DIETERICH. I wish to be heard on the conference report, if you please.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the report has been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been finally adopted.

Mr. DIETERICH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] has the floor. Does he yield for that purpose?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois if it does not take me off the floor.

Mr. DIETERICH. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Kansas. If agreeable I shall wait until the Senator from Kansas concludes and then consent to proceed with the conference report.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I submit a parliamentary inquiry. Has the report been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No it has not been adopted.

After the conclusion of Mr. CAPPER'S speech,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

S. 2632. An act to provide for the construction of 10 vessels for the Coast Guard designed for ice-breaking and assistance work; and

S. 3446. An act relative to limitation of shipowners' liability.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3002) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE—KANSAS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3434) to provide for the appointment of one additional judge for the district of Kansas.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, in presenting this matter to the Senate I do not feel there is any reason I should apologize for the manner in which the bill was introduced or referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. No effort is being made upon my part to jam the bill through at the close of the session of the Congress.

Sometime ago a bill was introduced in this body to create two additional judgeships for the State of California and two additional judgeships for the State of New York. When the bill was before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, the matter of the necessity for additional judges in other States was taken up and discussed by the committee. By virtue of discussions held at that time, and going into the matter to such extent as was deemed necessary, there was added to the bill a committee amendment providing for additional judges in several other States, among which was the State of Kansas.

The State of Missouri never was included in that bill; but a separate bill was introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], asking for two additional judges for the eastern and western districts of Missouri, one in each district. So the contention of my colleague that the reason the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary was because the States of Kansas and Missouri were in the bill is entirely erroneous, for Missouri never was included in the bill by the committee, nor was any request made by the Senators from that State that Missouri be included in the bill. However, the States of Oregon, New Mexico, Kentucky, West Virginia, South Dakota, and probably some other States in addition to the State of Kansas, were included in the bill.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to his colleague?

Mr. McGILL. I do.

Mr. CAPPER. My colleague has misunderstood me if he thinks I said that the bill was returned to the committee for the reason that the States of Missouri and Kansas were in the bill. I did not make that statement.

Mr. McGILL. I am glad to have the Senator correct his own statement. If he will read in the RECORD the remarks he made, I am sure he will find he did make the statement, although I am willing now to accept his explanation that it was not due to the fact these two States were included in the bill that it was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McGILL. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator has brought into the RECORD the name of the State which I represent in part as being included in the judiciary bill for the enlargement of the membership of the court.

Mr. McGILL. There was in the committee an amendment to the original bill reported to this body, to which I have made reference heretofore, which included the State of Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I am not conversant with the measure; but I am very, very certain of my position when I say that a bill of that kind has never passed either branch of the Congress.

Mr. McGILL. It has never passed either branch of Congress. I was about to explain what was done with the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so. Let me ask the Senator how many districts there are in the State of Kansas?

Mr. McGILL. One.

Mr. McNARY. How many judges are there?

Mr. McGILL. There is one active judge. I am coming to that issue.

As I understood—and I believe I am correct—the bill to which I have referred was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary because of the contention, and probably the logical contention, that a group of States should not be included in the same bill, but that each State should present its claims in a separate bill. I find no fault with that. The bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary; and bills affecting other States, many of which were included in the original committee amendment to which I have referred, were introduced and reported to this body.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon has asked me how many judges there are in the State of Kansas. It is true the Government is paying the salaries of two judges, and the disbursements will appear that way on the official records of the Department of Justice.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGILL. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but it is necessary that I leave the Chamber. Before he goes on with his remarks at this time, I wish to recall to the Senator that he and I, as members of the Judiciary Committee, did go quite thoroughly into the condition in Kansas, did we not?

Mr. McGILL. I thought we did.

Mr. HATCH. And as a result of our conferences with members of the committee and with others interested in the administration of justice in the State of Kansas, it was agreed that there was a decided need for an additional judge in the State of Kansas. Is that correct?

Mr. McGILL. That is correct; and I only regret it would not be ethical to mention the names of some of the persons who conferred with us on that occasion.

Mr. HATCH. That is quite correct. I also recall to the Senator's mind that there were discussed at that time the conditions in my own State, the State of New Mexico; and it was said then that I really should not press the demands of New Mexico at that time, because the demands of the State of Kansas were so much greater than those of the State of New Mexico, and we are both in the same judicial circuit.

Mr. McGILL. That is correct.

Mr. HATCH. For that reason, I will say to the Senator, I have not urged at this session the claims of the State of New Mexico for an additional judge. However, during the vacation I hope to assemble some additional facts and figures which will show that there is need for an additional judge in New Mexico.

I will say to the Senator from Kansas that as a result of our investigation into conditions in the State of Kansas, I am of opinion that he is thoroughly justified and should press his claim for an additional judge in his State.

Mr. McGILL. I thank the Senator. Prior to the question propounded by the Senator from New Mexico, I was stating that it is true the records of the Department of Justice will show the Government is paying two salaries for judges in the State of Kansas, or in that United States judicial district. Had Judge Pollock, who is an elderly gentleman, retired, he would have continued to be paid his salary. Judge Pollock is a man who is now approximately 80 years of age. He will be 80 years of age on his next birthday, which is not very far away.

Back in 1928 or 1929 Judge Hopkins was appointed, but prior to that time, and during the administration of President Coolidge, a United States district judge by the name of McDermott was appointed for the State of Kansas. Judge McDermott was appointed under the authority of the same statute under which Judge Hopkins is serving. Judge McDermott is no longer a district judge by reason of the fact that when the tenth circuit court of appeals was created he was appointed a member of the circuit court of appeals, whereupon Judge Hopkins was appointed judge of the district court.

I direct attention to Judge McDermott, however, because of the fact that the reason for appointing him a United States district judge was the identical reason Judge Hopkins was appointed a United States district judge, and by virtue of a statute which is quoted to me in a letter sent to me by Mr. William Stanley, who was formerly assistant to the Attorney General, and held that office until recently. The statute is mentioned in his letter, in which he states:

The State of Kansas constitutes one judicial district. There are two judges now serving in this district.

The Senator from Oregon will see that this answers his question:

There are two judges now serving in this district, namely, Hon. Richard J. Hopkins and Hon. John C. Pollock. Judge Pollock was originally appointed in 1903 and served as the only judge of this district until 1929, when Judge Hopkins was appointed pursuant to authority contained in Revised Statutes, section 714, as amended. The relevant part of this statute reads as follows:

Mr. President, I wish to point out that Mr. Stanley is mistaken in his letter, in that he says Judge Pollock was the only judge of that district until 1929. I practiced law in that district prior to coming to the Senate, for a period of 26 years, and I state to the Senate as a matter of fact, regardless of the letter from the Department of Justice, that a number of years before that time, under this statute I am about to read, Judge McDermott was appointed United States judge, and he served as such until the circuit court of appeals of the tenth circuit was created.

The pertinent portions of the statute to which I referred are:

In the event any circuit judge, or district judge, having so held a commission or commissions at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years as aforesaid, shall nevertheless remain in office, and not resign or retire as aforesaid, the President, if he finds any such judge is unable to discharge efficiently the duties of his office by reason of mental or physical disability of a permanent character, may, when necessary for the efficient dispatch of business, appoint * * * an additional circuit judge of the circuit or district judge of the district to which such disabled judge belongs.

Mr. Stanley continues:

Under the terms of this statute, no successor may be appointed to Judge Pollock.

In other words, when Judge Pollock either retires permanently or passes away, no successor can be appointed.

I am making no criticism whatever in this connection, nor have I made any criticism on any occasion, of Judge Pollock or of his ability as a judge, nor do I make any criticism with reference to Judge Hopkins. Judge Pollock was the judge of that court since 1903. To my mind, he has been during his time one of the most able, capable, efficient, and broad-minded judges we have had on the Federal bench. But he has reached the age of retirement, and I believe recognizes that he can no longer go forward with the regular work of a judge of a United States court.

I understand the fact to be but few cases have been handled by Judge Pollock in recent years. He, I am advised, spends the summer months in Canada and the winter months, generally, at Brownsville, Tex. He is probably in the State of Kansas 2 or 3 months of the year.

Kansas is in fact a one-judge State and a one-judge district. The business of that court, so far as it has been taken care of, has been handled since 1929 by Judge Hopkins. I refer again to the statute in order to call attention to the fact that in the Coolidge administration President Coolidge found Judge Pollock was physically unable to perform the duties of his office, and in the Hoover administration when Judge McDermott was appointed to the circuit court of appeals, and a new district judge was appointed, Mr. Hoover, as President, made the same finding with reference to Judge Pollock. Otherwise there would have been no authority for the appointment of Judge Hopkins.

Mr. President, this is not said in criticism of Judge Pollock himself, and I hope no one will construe my remarks in that light. He, considering his physical condition, has reached the age when it cannot be expected he should longer perform the duties of United States district judge.

I regret to refer to the fact, but my colleague in the Senate, the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], was a Member of this body at the time Judge McDermott and also at the later time when Judge Hopkins was confirmed by the Senate, those judges having been appointed under the statute to which I have referred.

Mr. President, I could read letters and statistics for the balance of the afternoon, but I do not consider that at all necessary.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGILL. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I find the printed committee report to be confined to a single page, which really contains no information whatever. I should like to ask the Senator two questions.

It is my understanding that ordinarily an increase in the Federal bench is made dependent, first, upon a recommendation by the Department of Justice, and second, on a recommendation from the annual conference of United States circuit judges. May I ask the Senator from Kansas whether the present bill is based upon a recommendation either by the Department of Justice or the conference of United States circuit judges?

Mr. McGILL. If the Senator from Michigan had been on the floor of the Senate at the time the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] interrogated me and made some references to the States of New Mexico and Kansas, he probably would have reached the conclusion that while a written statement had not been made, there had been some discussion between members of the higher court and the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from New Mexico. However, I will say to the Senator from Michigan if the rule is such as he has described, it has not been conformed to with reference to any other bill which has been before the Senate creating an additional judge during this session of Congress.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator may be right about that. We are constantly setting precedents during the present session of Congress.

Mr. McGILL. I do not know that there is any such rule as the Senator describes.

Mr. President, I must hasten, as I wish to conclude my remarks, and do not wish the consideration of the bill to take much more of the time of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGILL. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am moved to interrupt the Senator by virtue of the question propounded by the Senator from Michigan. While I do not know that there is a written rule, I think, however, while it probably did not occur at this session of Congress, there have been recommendations both from the Department of Justice and from the committee of the court of appeals to which the Senator referred, in reference to some judgeships—not all, but some of the judgeships which we have provided during the present session, although the recommendations were made a year or two ago.

Mr. McGILL. I think that was true with reference to California.

Mr. NORRIS. That was true with reference to California, I think, and true with reference to New York, and it was true with reference to Michigan and probably some other State.

Mr. CAPPER. May I ask my colleague if he knows of any recommendation having been made by the Department of Justice in this case?

Mr. McGILL. The Department of Justice has not made recommendations on this bill nor did it make recommendations on 10 other bills which were passed here in the last few days without any objection on the part of any Senator, including my colleague.

Mr. President, as I stated, I wish to conclude my remarks as quickly as I can. I am not going to enumerate all of the cases pending on the docket of the Federal court in Kansas. There was a falling off of criminal cases following the repeal of the National Prohibition Act. Especially in the State of Kansas there was a considerable falling off of criminal cases during the last several years, largely causing the distinctions which are drawn by my colleague. However, I have a letter from the Department of Justice, dated August 19, 1935, just last week, written by a special assistant to the Attorney General, Mr. Holtzoff, in which he says:

> In accordance with our conversation of this morning I take pleasure in sending you herewith some statistics for your use relative to the judicial business of the Federal courts in Kansas. You will notice that during the fiscal year just ended there has been a considerable increase both in the private litigation and in the criminal cases handled by that court.
> With kindest personal regards, sincerely yours,
> ALEXANDER HOLTZOFF.

Here are the figures which his statement gives for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935. It shows that of private litigation in 1934, 231 cases were filed. In 1935, 315 cases were filed.

It shows that at the end of the fiscal year 1934 there were 377 such cases still pending, and at the end of the fiscal year on June 30, 1935, there were 445 private cases still pending.

It discloses there were instituted civil cases in which the United States was a party, in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, 91 cases; in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, 137 cases.

There were 221 cases pending on the docket at the end of the fiscal year 1935.

There were 422 criminal cases instituted during the fiscal year 1935, and 190 were pending on the docket at the close of the fiscal year.

Seven hundred and nineteen bankruptcy cases instituted during the fiscal year of 1934, and there were 1,180 such cases instituted during the fiscal year 1935. There were pending on the docket of the court at the end of the fiscal year June 30, 1935, according to the report of the Department of Justice, 1,989 cases in that judicial district.

Mr. President, there are two other matters to which I wish to refer and then I shall conclude my remarks. I have innumerable letters on this subject. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read them, because I know that most any kind of letters can be procured by anyone who desires to get them. I have letters from lawyers and from bar associations. With the exception of the Kansas City Bar Association, which is composed of about 175 lawyers—and reports have reached me to the effect that only 47 members attended and voted at the meeting of the bar association in which the resolutions which were presented here were adopted, and also with the exception of the Topeka and Iola Bar Association, the bar associations over the State generally have endorsed this measure, or a measure to provide an additional judge for the State of Kansas.

Likewise, while the former bill was pending I received a wire from the president of the Kansas State Bar Association, in which he referred to the fact that the executive council of that association had gone on record as endorsing such a measure.

I also have a letter from the president of the State bar association of the State of Kansas incorporating similar facts. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate to read communications which have been addressed to me endorsing this bill.

However, I do wish to refer to this fact. I addressed a letter to the clerk of the United States court in Kansas asking him to make for me a detailed statement of all the fees which had been paid by private litigants to special masters to handle, try, and dispose of their lawsuits. It is a practice which is permitted, it is true, but when it is frequently indulged in it is a practice which is frowned upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. His statement shows he does not include all of the masters' fees paid in that judicial district over the period of the last 10 years such as I asked him to render to me, but that he has left out of his statement such fees as have been paid in foreclosure suits where they have been charged to the cost of the case. However, it does show that for a period of the last 10 years special masters were paid in fees to handle and dispose of law suits wherein the judge was evidently unable to take charge of the cases, the sum of $77,707.09.

I discovered this is not all. I wrote to a lawyer friend of mine at Fort Scott, Kans., asking him to give me the amount of fees paid there where the court holds sessions at certain intervals of the year, and I find from that division of the court alone there should be added at least $13,000 to the amount the clerk's statement originally contained. In other words, it shows that litigants have in private lawsuits in that court paid as much over a period of 10 years as the salary of a full-time judge would have cost the Government. If that does not answer the contention that the judge out there is able to take care of all the cases, then I fail to know what would constitute an answer.

Mr. President, there is just one other matter to which I will refer and then, unless there are questions, I am not going to take up further time. I could introduce just as many letters favorable to this bill, and I know I could introduce more than could be read in opposition to it.

During the present session of the Congress an additional judge was provided for the State of Virginia, which I think was proper. I think that State was entitled to an additional judge. An additional judge was provided for the State of West Virginia, 1 additional judge for Kentucky, 1 additional judge for Tennessee, 1 additional judge for the State of Oklahoma, 2 for California, 2 for New York, 1 for Missouri, and 1 for South Dakota.

Mr. President, the State of West Virginia has a lesser population than the State of Kansas. It had, prior to the time the bill providing for an additional judge was passed by the Senate, 2 United States judges, and the bill which was passed by the Senate gives that State a total of 3 United States judges. The State of Kentucky had 2 United States judges, as I recall, and now will have 3.

Tennessee, if I am not mistaken, had 3 Federal judges, and now will have 4.

Oklahoma, adjoining Kansas on the south, has three United States judges. Its population is but little more than that of Kansas. I think Oklahoma has one more congressional district than has Kansas. If the bill passed the other day by the Senate becomes law, Oklahoma will have 4 judges, while Kansas, if this bill shall fail, will still have but 1.

The State of Missouri had four United States judges prior to yesterday, when the Senate, by unanimous consent, passed a bill providing for the State of Missouri an additional United States judge. Missouri has about twice the population of the State of Kansas. Missouri has about 4,000,000 population, while Kansas has approximately 2,000,000. I think the population is now greater than that, but the last census, the census taken in 1930, showed just a little less than 2,000,000.

The State of South Dakota has a population, according to the census of 1930, of 692,849, while Kansas, according to that census, has a population of 1,880,999, so that more than three times the number of people live in the State of Kansas than live in South Dakota; but, notwithstanding that fact, yesterday afternoon, after the bill providing for the additional judge in Kansas had been objected to during the consideration of the Unanimous Consent Calendar by my distinguished colleague the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], a bill providing an additional judge for the State of South Dakota was passed, and no objection was raised by him or by any other Senator. The same thing was true yesterday with reference to the bill providing an additional judge for the State of Missouri. None of the other measures providing in all for 11 additional judges which have passed the Senate during the present session has been objected to save and except the bill applying to the State of Kansas, and only by those who have some reason other than the business transacted in the court.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take up more time. I desire to close with the remark that, with the exception of the State of Colorado, every other State in the American Union having but one United States district judge has less than half the population of the State of Kansas.

I hope, Mr. President, that we may have a record vote on this bill and that it will be passed.

Mr. McGILL subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, immediately following my remarks, a telegram received by me from Douglas Hudson, president of the Kansas State Bar Association.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORT SCOTT, KANS., April 8, 1935.

Hon. GEORGE F. MCGILL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Executive council of State bar association, representing all portions of Kansas, favors additional Federal judge. Their sentiment is that considering population and territory it would increase judicial dispatch of business and obviate use of special masters if additional judge were available. Recent extension of Federal authority certainly presages great increase in Federal court work. The council is almost unanimous in its expression of approval of your effort toward this end.

DOUGLAS HUDSON,
President Kansas State Bar Association.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to be heard briefly on the pending question. I have no personal interest, of course, in this bill, and, so far as I know, I have no prejudice in regard to it; but it seems to me something of a general nature ought to be said with reference to the activities of Congress in creating new judgeships.

I do not wish to claim, even indirectly, that any Senator in any of these cases is moved by any improper motive; but, as I see it, the movement seems to cover the country, so that we are going on from one State to another and creating new judgeships. With due respect to the junior Senator from Kansas, if we shall pass this bill, as I presume we will in a few minutes, we will only afford a good reason for the creation of judgeships in States which under existing conditions have not the number of judges that Kansas would have if this bill should pass and an additional judge for Kansas should be provided.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McGILL. The Senator recognizes the fact that Nebraska has less population than has Kansas, does he not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McGILL. It has one less congressional district.

Mr. NORRIS. It only has one judicial district, but has two judges.

Mr. McGILL. It has two judges.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, I recognize that fact. Kansas has one judicial district, as I understand, and two judges.

Mr. McGILL. I maintain that there is really but one, and that it cannot reasonably be contended there is more than one active judge in Kansas.

Mr. NORRIS. It at least could be contended that if every time a judge, on account of age, becomes somewhat infirm and disabled, we enacted a law permitting the appointment of another judge to take his place, we would have 10,000 judges in the United States before many months passed.

If Judge Pollock should retire, as I presume he will soon, then there would be some necessity for this action, in my judgment, but the record that has been produced indicates that, from the standpoint of cases actually pending and delay in litigation, conditions in Kansas are better than in almost any other district of the United States. It is remarkable how in the State of Kansas the judges, even the one who is now incapacitated to some extent, perhaps, by age, have kept abreast of the litigation. The letters of the judge himself, I think, show conclusively that to be the condition.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McGILL. The Senator does not understand that there was a letter read from Judge Hopkins, of the district court of the United States, does he? As I understand, no letter was read from him.

Mr. NORRIS. A letter was offered for the RECORD from the United States district judge.

Mr. McGILL. I did not so understand.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood that it was. I have it on my desk here.

Mr. McGILL. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. And I intended to offer it; but I thought the Senator's colleague had already offered it, and so I would not offer it again.

Let me ask the senior Senator from Kansas did he offer the letter of Judge Hopkins to the Kansas Bar Association?

Mr. CAPPER. I offered a letter from the clerk of the District Court of Kansas setting forth the condition of business there and showing the condition to be better than it has been for several years.

Mr. NORRIS. I supposed I had what the senior Senator from Kansas had offered. I have much of the same evidence that he had, although not nearly so many letters. Did the senior Senator from Kansas place in the RECORD the letter of Judge Hopkins to Mr. Douglas Hudson, of the Bar Association of the State of Kansas?

Mr. CAPPER. No; I did not put in that letter. I put in a letter to him from the clerk of the court showing the conditions over a 10-year period as revealed by the record.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter of the United States district judge, Richard Hopkins, directed to Hon. Douglas Hudson, president of the Bar Association of the State of Kansas, Fort Scott, Kans., be printed as a part of my remarks. I will not stop to read it, but it bears out fully the evidence shown in the letter which the senior Senator from Kansas offered from the clerk. The judge gets some of his evidence from the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES COURT CHAMBERS,
DISTRICT OF KANSAS, RICHARD J. HOPKINS, DISTRICT JUDGE,
Topeka, Kans., April 13, 1935.

Hon. DOUGLAS HUDSON,
President Bar Association of the State of Kansas,
Fort Scott, Kans.

DEAR MR. HUDSON: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 8, in which you ask my views "as to the advisability or necessity of an additional judge for this district."

In answer thereto have to say that I presume the condition of business in the district as reflected by records in the clerk's office forms the proper basis for a decision as to whether or not there is necessity for another judge.

I understand from the clerk's office that the dockets in the three divisions in this district are in better condition than at any time in the last 5 years. Your inquiry prompts the following observations:

There are a large number of war-risk insurance cases on the dockets which have been pending some 3 or 4 years. For the last year and a half attorneys for the plaintiffs and the Government have been urged to prepare and dispose of such cases. It has appeared at times that many of such cases should be stricken from the dockets because of failure of litigants or their counsel to prepare or try them and counsel have been so notified in open court. In practically all instances counsel for one side or the other have begged the court to let the cases remain on the docket. Sometime before the beginning of the last December term in Kansas City, the clerk was requested to notify counsel in all war-risk cases in this division to prepare their cases and be ready for trial looking to their disposition at that term of court. On calling the docket counsel on both sides supplicated the court to grant them further additional time. Recently upon my insistence at the Wichita term (second division) the Government promised and agreed to have all war-risk insurance cases ready for trial at the next (September) term of court. At the beginning of the April term in the first division, beginning next Monday in Topeka, I shall again insist on a disposition of such cases in the first division.

Something like a year ago the clerk was requested to notify attorneys in equity cases under my jurisdiction to proceed as rapidly as possible looking to their final disposition. The court is ready, able, and willing to hear all cases—law and equity—as soon as they are ready for trial. For instance, at the recent March term of this court in the second division at Wichita, the court heard every case, criminal and civil, law and equity, that was ready for trial; also heard every motion and demurrer which counsel were ready to present. The same procedure will be followed at the regular April term in Topeka, beginning next Monday and the regular term in Fort Scott, convening early in May.

So far as I am able to advise you, the court is ready and willing to hear every case, every demurrer, every motion that can be prepared and presented without any delay.

Hoping the above answers your inquiry, I am, with kind regards

Respectfully yours,

RICHARD J. HOPKINS.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Nebraska, for a number of years, was the distinguished Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. May I ask him if it has not heretofore been the uniform practice that proposals for additional United States district judges should first be submitted to the annual conference of circuit judges for survey and recommendation?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but I do not think there was any definite rule or anything of that kind.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But it was the general practice?

Mr. NORRIS. It was, I think, always done.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator think that it would be sound practice always to pursue that course for the information of the Senate and its Judiciary Committee?

Mr. NORRIS. It probably would be too much to say that it would always be "sound practice", but it would, at least, be a very good practice, I should think, although I would not agree, in advance, to vote against the creation of a new judgeship even though the judicial conference was opposed to it. I still think the committee and the Senate ought to pass on such measures. It would, however, be an excellent practice, and, as far as I know, has always heretofore been followed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And surely it may be said that a United States circuit judge ought to have an intimate supervisory knowledge of the problems of the United States district court.

Mr. NORRIS. He certainly does have; he cannot help but have.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Nebraska if it has not been the practice in years past to have a statement from the Attorney General or the Department of Justice in all such cases?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and, as a matter of practice, that course is still followed, I think. Bills of this character are referred to the Department of Justice, as other bills are referred to the respective departments with which they deal.

Mr. CAPPER. So far as I have been able to learn, there has been no action of that kind in this case.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know as to that. I am not offering that as an argument against the bill. In fact, I am not trying to differentiate this case from any other. I listened to the junior Senator from Kansas with a great deal of interest when he referred to other bills providing for the creation of new judgeships which have been passed sometimes by unanimous consent. The junior Senator from Kansas was absolutely right, I think, and I offer no word of criticism about it, except that I think the Senate has been wrong in proceeding in that way. I do not mean any disrespect to any Senator when I say that I do not agree with the action of the Senate in that respect, I do not agree with the course that has been pursued for years and years by Congress in creating various new judgeships on all kinds of excuses.

I remember several years ago there was put through Congress a bill providing for an additional judgeship in a State where it was admitted there were sufficient judges, but it was done on the ground that the senior judge there was really incapacitated, that he was permanently disabled.

I recall that a great deal of debate took place in the Judiciary Committee in connection with that case, and the bill was passed. I voted for it; I was convinced of the necessity for the legislation. I was, however, surprised several years afterward to have call on me in my office the judge, whom I had never met and whom we had really displaced by putting in another man, who was healthy, and making him senior presiding judge. The judge who had been displaced was much healthier than I was and looked, and probably was, much younger. I immediately asked him how he stayed out of the grave. Yet he was absolutely incapacitated at the time we had passed that bill. He had fully recovered. He was suffering no infirmity and was still drawing the salary and doing the work. The young judge, who by law had been made the senior judge in that distract, was also probably doing good work but doing a good deal of fishing besides.

These things have been happening and they are going to come home to us to roost. The present Congress especially has been creating too many new jobs. We should let some of them go over. We should lessen the expenses of the Government. I say to my Democratic friends that they will have to answer for these things at the polls, even though they are doing some of the things their Republican predecessors did.

I started to refer to the argument of the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL] about other States having more judges and fewer people. That is true. That is given now as a reason why we should pass this bill. This will only add to the situation. The passage of this bill will only give an additional reason why we should provide for another judge in some other State where, as a matter of fact, he is not needed.

I want to utter a word of admonition. The time will come when we will have to stop creating these judgeships. We have created so many district judgeships now that if we create any more the rest of us will have to get off the sidewalk. There will not be enough space on the sidewalk for the judges and the rest of us. I think we ought to call a halt on this matter of creating new judgeships. My own opinion is that we ought not to have passed the bill to which the junior Senator from Kansas referred creating a new judgeship for the State of Missouri. There are probably just as good reasons for creating a new judgeship in Kansas as there are for creating new judgeships in some of the other States. Perhaps we should follow the calling of the Unanimous Consent Calendar more carefully and object more than we do. That suggestion applies to myself as well as it does to other Senators.

The senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] has brought the matter to our attention. I think he has done an admirable work in so doing. The responsibility now is ours. I believe we ought to heed the admonition that we are going too fast in the creation of these judgeships.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEELY. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. McGILL. I move to lay the motion on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO FILE DURING RECESS PUBLIC UTILITIES CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during any recess of the Senate the conferees on the public utilities holding bill may be permitted to file any report upon which they may have reached an agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

REGULATION OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE IN GRAINS

Mr. BORAH. I desire to take this opportunity to call attention to a bill which it seems to me we can dispose of and which it seems to me we ought to dispose of promptly. I refer to what is known as the "commodities exchange bill", being the bill (H. R. 6772) to amend the Grain Futures Act to prevent and remove obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in grains and other commodities by regulating transactions therein on commodity futures exchanges, to limit or abolish short selling, to curb manipulation, and for other purposes.

I call attention to some of the provisions of the bill which show the importance of disposing of it. The bill has been passed by the House. It is before the Senate with the unanimous approval of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and therefore it ought not to take much time to dispose of it.

I invite attention to page 4 of the bill, where it is provided:

SEC. 4a. (1) Excessive speculation in any commodity under contracts of sale of such commodity for future delivery made on or subject to the rules of contract markets causing sudden or unreasonable fluctuations or unwarranted changes in the price of such commodity, is an undue and unnecessary burden on interstate commerce in such commodity. For the purpose of diminishing, eliminating, or preventing such burden, the commission shall, from time to time, after due notice and opportunity for hearing, by order, proclaim and fix such limits on the amount of trading under contracts of sale of such commodity for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any contract market which may be done by any person as the commission finds is necessary to diminish, eliminate, or prevent such burden. Nothing in this section shall be construed to prohibit the commission from fixing different trading limits for different commodities, markets, futures, or delivery months, or different trading limits for buying and selling operations, or different limits for the purposes of subparagraphs (A) and (B) of this section, or from exempting transactions commonly known to the trade as "spreads" or "straddles" or from fixing trading limits applying to such transactions different from trading limits fixed for other transactions.

(2) The commission shall, in such order, fix a reasonable time (not to exceed 10 days) after the order's promulgation; after which, and until such order is suspended, modified, or revoked, it shall be unlawful for any person—

(A) directly or indirectly to buy or sell, or agree to buy or sell, under contracts of sale of such commodity for future delivery on or subject to the rules of the contract market or markets to which the order applies, any amount of such commodity during any one business day in excess of any trading limit fixed for one business day by the commission in such order for or with respect to such commodity; or

(B) directly or indirectly to buy or sell, or agree to buy or sell, under contracts of sale of such commodity for future delivery on or subject to the rules of any contract market, any amount of such commodity that shall result in giving such person a net long or net short position at any one time in or with respect to any such commodity in excess of any trading limit fixed by the commission for net long or net short position in such order for or with respect to such commodity.

I call attention to these provisions of the bill to indicate the nature of the measure and its importance, as the producers of grain believe. I call attention to the further fact that the bill is here as a House bill, and, as I said a moment ago, has the unanimous support of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I am aware that if it were a controversial matter it would be difficult at this late hour in the session, perhaps, to do anything if we are to adjourn as is contemplated. However, it seems to me, in view of the bill having passed the House and having the unanimous report of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the importance of the measure is such that we ought to be able to find time to pass it.

I would not wish to offer it as an amendment to some other bill if that could be avoided, but I feel that I would be justified in doing so if we cannot find time otherwise to dispose of it. If it is possible to force consideration of the bill, I shall avail myself of the opportunity.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not familiar with the bill. Of course, I am not opposed to the provisions which have been read by the Senator from Idaho. However, a rider has been put on the bill which the Senator will find on page 27, which refers to cotton alone. I know nothing of the subject matter, though perhaps I should, but those who are engaged in the cotton industry in the State of California have vigorously protested to me against this particular rider on the bill. Has the Senator any interest in that rider?

Mr. BORAH. I have no interest in the rider.

Mr. JOHNSON. The fact of the matter is that if it should remain in the bill and the bill should go to conference there would be no possibility of it becoming a law.

Mr. BORAH. When the measure comes up, if it does, so far as I am concerned, having no interest in the provision, I shall not object to it being stricken out.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS—NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULES

Mr. KING submitted the following notice of motion to suspend the rules:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule 16, for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 9215) making appropriations to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, the following amendment, viz: At the proper place in the bill to insert the following:

"The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby directed to make loans to producers of copper which is mined in the United States, of 15 cents per pound, secured by copper stored in warehouses or other places to be approved by said Corporation upon such terms and conditions as shall fully protect the interests of said Corporation and the United States."

STABILIZATION OF BITUMINOUS COAL MINING INDUSTRY—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. NEELY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the coal bill, which I submitted some time ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report is a privileged matter, and has been read. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two House on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9100) to stabilize the bituminous coal mining industry and promote its interstate commerce; to provide for cooperative marketing of bituminous coal; to levy a tax on bituminous coal and provide for a drawback under certain conditions; to declare the production, distribution, and use of bituminous coal to be affected with a national public interest; to conserve the bituminous-coal resources of the United States; to provide for the general welfare; and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I shall not take up the time of the Senate with a further discussion of this particular measure. I did not, however, wish to permit this conference report to be adopted without stating my attitude and my position as one of the Senators from one of the sovereign States affected.

When the conferees were appointed upon this particular matter—I do not know by whom or how the selection was made—after numerous amendments had been received without any protests, without any chance to debate them, without any chance for the Senate to vote upon the particular amendments at that time, I was a little bit puzzled to know how they selected conferees, not that I had any objection at all against them, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], whose views upon the measure are very pronounced, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], from another area affected, and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], I knew that the amendments that were presented and adopted so readily would receive very serious and substantial support from the Senate conferees. I was almost expecting violence in that conference, because I knew the conferees were thoroughly in sympathy with the amendments which were presented.

It so happens that after a very long and vigorous fight, no doubt presenting every reason why the amendments adopted by the Senate should be embodied in the bill, the Senate conferees were finally, by sheer exhaustion, forced to yield their position upon that particular measure, and especially upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, which placed Illinois, Indiana, and Iowa in a little family group of its own that it had enjoyed ever since the days of N. R. A.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator has been spying and eavesdropping, or he never would have known what a heroic battle the conferees on the part of the Senate waged in the effort to retain the amendments to which he refers. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think the Senator from Illinois made the observation about the conferees in a facetious vein, because my spies bring me word that after having been in session until 26 minutes after 5 this morning, when they refused to yield, it was only 27 minutes after 5 this morning when, absolutely exhausted, they surrendered to the House on these amendments. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIETERICH. I thank the Senator for that information, because I like to have the information that conferees appointed to maintain the position of this dignified branch of the Congress performed their duty courageously and well; and I think they deserve a vote of thanks from the Senate for the faithful and efficient manner in which they have succeeded in having erased from the bill every material amendment adopted by the Senate. It leaves the bill in the same position in which it previously was.

I will confess that the amendments did not remedy very much of the harm that will be accomplished by this bill to the citizens of my State; but I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in these closing hours—or what we hope are the closing hours, when there is a prospect of our going home and getting acquainted with our families again—in a further discussion of the provisions of this bill. It may be true that the old watchdog will probably bite us because we have not seen him for so long that we shall have to be reintroduced and pet him up again to get acquainted. So I am not going to take up the time of the Senate, because I am not in the habit of doing foolish things. I am not even going to ask for a roll call. I rise simply to express my own individual attitude, that I still think this is a bad measure for Congress to pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

TAXATION TO EFFECTUATE RAILWAY EMPLOYEES' RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. HARRISON. From the Committee on Finance, I report back favorably, without amendment, House bill 8652, to levy an excise tax upon carriers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the title of the bill.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 8652) to levy an excise tax upon carriers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

DEFINITIONS

ACTIVITIES AND OPERATIONS OF THE FEDERAL FARM BOARD (REPT. NO. 1456)

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as chairman of a committee selected from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I submit a full report on the financial operations of the Federal Farm Board, with some references to transactions of allied organizations and of the Farm Credit Administration, which succeeded the Farm Board. The report is of the date of July 1935.

Mr. President, I herewith submit for the RECORD a brief synopsis and short analysis of the report, which is quite voluminous.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will lie on the table. Is there objection to printing the synopsis referred to in the RECORD? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

From its organization in 1929 until it was succeeded in May 1933 by the Farm Credit Administration the Federal Farm Board made loans for the aid of agriculture amounting approximately to $1,150,000,000.

These loans were drawn from a revolving fund, into which the Congress appropriated $500,000,000. Thirteen and one-third million dollars were collected by the Farm Board as interest. The remainder of the total loaned was due to turn-over of the money.

Nearly $746,000,000, comprising 65 percent of the gross loans which the Farm Board made from the revolving fund, were loaned to the grain and cotton stabilization corporations in efforts to maintain price levels for the producers of those commodities. In addition, $200,000,000 of the Board's gross loans to the agricultural cooperative associations were identifiable as loans for maintaining prices or for redeeming the commodity-collateral loans of Federal intermediate credit banks and other banks, besides an undetermined amount similarly used though loaned for other purposes.

Including the $200,000,000 just mentioned, a total of $403,000,000 was loaned by the Farm Board to national, regional, State, and local cooperatives.

Two-thirds of this amount went to six national cooperatives dealing in grain, cotton, wool, livestock, nuts, fruit, and vegetables.

The remaining one-third was loaned to 159 regional, State, and local cooperatives in 39 States and the Territory of Puerto Rico. These cooperatives comprised growers of wheat and cotton, raisers of livestock and poultry, woolgrowers, and producers of tobacco, rice, grass seed, sugar beets, beans, soybeans, apples, oranges, cherries, grapes, mushrooms, nuts, vegetables, honey and coffee.

Aside from the financing of price-pegging activities the money was borrowed by the cooperatives for paying organization and current operating expenses, buying and building storage facilities, creameries, canning, packing, and processing plants, and for the legitimate financing of the current marketing of members' crops.

It can now be seen that the stabilization activities were foredoomed to failure; but the Farm Board made its loans for price pegging without the benefit of the certainties which experience since has taught. The Board set up its stabilization program in response to urgent public demand; and acted, when it did proceed, on assurance from respected advisers that there was no alternative to price pegging and no strong likelihood of its failure.

Inability to halt the decline of commodity prices led to severe losses. The cooperatives and the stabilization corporation accumulated stocks of wheat and cotton for which no market appeared. By acts of the Congress large portions of these stocks were donated to the Red Cross for use in relief of distress at a loss to the revolving fund of $197,000,000. Other cotton was taken over by the Department of Agriculture under the terms of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and in this settlement the revolving fund has sustained a further loss of $45,000,000.

Failure to halt the decline of commodity prices was responsible also for losses incurred in settlement of some of the loans made by the Board to the cooperatives. Inexperience, extravagance, avarice, and in a few cases dishonesty on the part of officials and employees of some of the cooperatives increased these losses.

At the close of the last fiscal year—June 30, 1935—a little over $13,000,000 had been written off in compromise of loans, in addition to the losses of nearly $244,000,000 sustained in disposing of wheat and cotton stocks. It was estimated by the Farm Credit Administration as of the same date that of $125,000,000 then outstanding to the revolving fund in unpaid loan balances, not much more than $37,000,000 were likely to prove collectible.

On that basis the actual and prospective losses to the revolving fund, as of the end of the fiscal year last closed, amounted to $344,900,000; equivalent to 67 percent of the amount of the fund (principal and interest collected), or equivalent to 69 cents out of every dollar appropriated by the Congress to the principal of the fund.

Magnitude of the loans to associations of grain growers caused the committee to have a special study made of the Farm Board's grain loans, which amounted to nearly $635,600,000, and about half of the text of the committee's report is devoted to a summary of the organization of Farmers' National Grain Corporation, a national cooperative association which the Farm Board sponsored, and of its intercorporate relations with Grain Stabilization Corporation and the financial transactions of the two companies.

Another section of the report deals similarly, but more briefly, with American Cotton Cooperative Association, Cotton Stabilization Corporation, and the 14 State cotton cooperatives, borrowers to whom the Farm Board made loans aggregating slightly over $409,000,000.

It was in connection with these two groups of loans—involving, as they did, the major stabilization activities, and also involving the principal instances of sharp dealing with the Government by cooperative organizations—that the most of the Board's losses occurred.

The losses were costly. The committee in its report has sought to summarize the Board's experiences in a manner most useful as a guide to future policy in financing farm marketing. The prominence which, accordingly, the report gives to the Board's losses and its unfortunate transactions ought not to obscure the value of the assistance afforded by the revolving fund to scores of smaller-scale cooperatives who utilized it in good faith and punctiliously met their obligations.

OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there is lying on the table a joint resolution to continue the mail contracts until the 30th of April next. I ask that the joint resolution be read, and then I shall ask unanimous consent that it be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 175?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, is that motion subject to discussion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is open to debate.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask what the joint resolution is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the joint resolution for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 175) to extend the time within which contracts may be modified or canceled under the provisions of section 5 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 5 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, as amended, be amended by striking out "October 31, 1935" and inserting in lieu thereof "April 30, 1936."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. COPELAND. I move to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

CHANGE OF NAME OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I call attention to the bill which a number of times I have moved that the Senate consider. I refer to Calendar No. 1204, Senate bill 2665. There seems to be considerable difficulty in reaching any conclusion as to the bill; and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] have moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, assuming that there some harmonious arrangement might be made. Not being able to concur in that suggestion, I take the liberty of superseding all these motions, including those I myself made, by LOW moving that the bill be continued and set over until January, remaining on the calendar, as suggested by my colleague the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

I give notice now that at the opening of the next session I shall, at the first convenient moment, move to take up, consider, and act upon the bill, I trust to final passage.

AIR CORPS TECHNICAL SCHOOL, COLORADO

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3398, to establish the Air Corps Technical School and to acquire certain land in the State of Colorado for use as a site for said Air Corps Technical School and as an aerial gunnery and bombing range for the Army Air Corps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DIETERICH. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I am opposed to the motion that the Senate take up this bill at this particular time. I have not my calendar at hand, but I assume that it is the bill which was introduced by the Senator from Colorado looking to the establishment of an aviation training school at Denver.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, the Air Corps Technical School is now located in the State of Illinois, at Rantoul Field, near the University of Illinois, and has been there ever since it was removed from Kelly Field, in Texas. Lands of sufficient area have been acquired to accommodate the institution. Buildings and equipment are located there, and the particular training for which the school was established has been carried on at Rantoul Field, and is being carried on there at the present time.

For some reason or other the appropriations which were available for improving that particular field have not been expended by the War Department, and the field is not in a good state of repair. The quarters for the officers and enlisted men are not as comfortable as they should be by reason of the fact that, for some reason or other, there has been a disposition to relocate the field.

Mr. President, matters like this should never be the subject of a community contest; they should never be a subject for which certain localities can bid, and that is exactly what was done in this case. The energetic Chamber of Commerce of Denver, Colo., began to offer inducements for the removal of the field to Denver, and the aim of this bill is to authorize the Secretary of War to accept the donations that were made by Denver. It is the matter of one locality, located in one sovereign State, purchasing an activity located in another State.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I assume the Senator from Illinois is fully aware of the fact that not until a committee of experts, representing the United States Army, after touring the United States, had made a report in favor of locating the technical Air Corps course school at Denver, did the city of Denver offer, without cost to the Federal Government, an adequate site for that school.

Mr. DIETERICH. I understand a committee of technical Army officers visited Denver, and when they got through visiting Denver they were very much sold on locating the activity at Denver. I know that the Denver Chamber of Commerce has been very active in this matter. I am not saying improperly, but I assume that the committee referred to did not lack for entertainment or inducement to try to locate the flying field at Denver. It might be that it is more desirable to live out at the foot of the Rocky Mountains than upon the plains of Illinois.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Could any more inducement be offered than to take people out and show them the beautiful site at Denver?

Mr. DIETERICH. It is a beautiful place, but the rights of sovereign States should be considered when there is a proposal to remove such activities.

I understand that the prairies and the plains of Illinois may not be so attractive as the mountain regions, but, at the same time, Illinois pays her part of the revenues, and I think that if Senators will examine the records they will find she pays much more than some of the States which are asking for these favors.

Illinois is the center of population of the central Northwest, from which region the boys who are being trained for this branch of the military establishment are drawn. The fields of Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Ohio, and Missouri are almost the center of population, and I assume that that ought to be taken into consideration.

So far as the records show, the physical training can be had just as well where the field is now located. Moving this institution would mean a loss; it would mean scrapping the equipment the Government has there; it would mean wrecking the structures it has at that field, and it would mean an additional expense. So I do not feel that this bill should be taken up at this late date, until the Senate has the time, and until those interested in this matter may have an opportunity to present the reasons for and against.

I do not wish to take up time now, but I say frankly and candidly that, in the interest of my State, and in the interest of the north central west, I shall not let this removal take place until the Senate is acquainted with every bit of the testimony that was given before the committee, and with the reports of the committee. Until Senators are thoroughly advised, I am not going to let an injustice like this be perpetrated merely because Denver has an enthusiastic chamber of commerce.

PARTICIPATION OF UNITED STATES IN FUTURE WARS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not wish to get into the discussion between Denver and Illinois, but I desire to discuss another matter very briefly.

I have not had an opportunity to review the morning papers, but a Member of this body has informed me that a Labor leader in the House of Commons in England has delivered a speech in which he has stated that it may be well understood that if Great Britain should enter into any war growing out of the Abyssinian situation the United States will become a party to whatever move England may see fit to make. As I have said, I have not read the newspapers today, and I am merely quoting what is told me by a very enthusiastic Member of this body.

However, I have just noted a headline in a local newspaper, published in this city, the Washington Times, which quotes a Member of this body as follows:

Senator POPE sees United States in next war.

So that within a space of 24 hours a Member of the Parliament of England and a Member of the parliament of the United States are headlined in the newspapers with their comments to the effect that the United States will be in a war at an early date, or words to that effect.

While I was away yesterday I regretted to see that the news reports said that the President of the United States was opposing the far-reaching measure which had been adopted by the Senate to keep America out of the next war. I understand, according to the newspaper headlines and reports, much to my regret, that the President of the United States has felt that the Senate has gone too far in its undertaking to keep America out of the next war.

I am not much of a historian, Mr. President, I am glad to say. I pay very little attention to the causes and purposes of wars as history records them, but if I am any judge of the events of history it is that every ruler in distress finds war the most ready surcease from known and positive failure. In other words, as I understand from what little history I can read between the lines, it has always been the case that rulers of all countries and of all times have sought war as a means of covering up their own failing political fortunes. I would not say that that has always been the case with this country, and I would not say that that has always been the case with any other country; but the common report is that in many quarters certain semidictators and "quatre" dictators, if I may use that old Cajan expression, have undertaken to some extent to say, "Let the world beware"; that war is in the air. That is the one resource and recourse which every failing, falling, would-be ruler of this country or any other country, I think, has had; and so I would hate to see any Member of either House of Congress, whether he is at this end of the Capitol or the other end of the Capitol, be willing to mellow or modify any purpose or resolution which the Senate has seen fit to adopt to keep this country from participating in the next war.

I am very sorry, Mr. President, but I have heard the rumor that the intimation that America will soon be in a war has not only come from the lips of a Senator and from a member of the British Parliament 3,000 miles away but I have heard the rumor on the streets of this Capital City that from very high circles has come the statement that America may be expected to be in a war at an early date. If it shall be, it will not be attributable to the Senate. It will not be attributable to the people of this country. I make the statement now, and I want it to be in indelible form, that if America is drawn into this next war, or a war of any kind or character, it will be done by design.

AIR CORPS TECHNICAL SCHOOL, COLORADO

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3398.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, in view of the statement by the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], an affirmative word should doubtless be said with respect to the pending bill. The measure was favorably reported to the Senate by the Senate Military Affairs Committee following extended hearings. Those committee hearings were held on the specific recommendations of representatives of the War Department, who personally visited many parts of the United States to ascertain the most suitable and technically valuable site for an Air Corps school. The Army investigation was conducted with painstaking care through many months. The incomparable advantages of Denver for that purpose are set out in the detailed and comparative report which was filed with the Senate Committee on Military Affairs in March of this year.

The bill neither provides nor authorizes any appropriation. It merely enables the Secretary of War to establish the school and accept on behalf of the United States for use a site for such school land, with fee simple title, within the limits of the city of Denver; also a tract of land in Colorado for aerial gunnery and bombing purposes. It should be added that following the filing of that report, at a spring election this year, taxpayers of the city of Denver voted to issue bonds in the amount of $750,000 with which to purchase an especially desirable site, to be tendered without cost to the Federal Government for these purposes.

Mr. President, in confirmation of what I have just said, I trust that the distinguished Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate may make whatever statement he may consider appropriate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3398.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I shall follow the Senator from Texas, the Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, and I reserve for the moment until he has concluded.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senate Military Affairs Committee I desire to say that on March 13, 1935, the War Department transmitted to us the report of a board of Air Corps officers recommending that certain property in Denver, Colo., be acquired by the Department, and that the Air Corps technical school be located thereon. The board found that Chanute Field, Rantoul, Ill., the present location, was unsuitable as a location for the Air Corps technical school, and that the best location for the school it could find, after investigating numerous sites throughout the country—some 86, as I remember—was Denver, Colo.

Following the receipt of this report a subcommittee of the Senate Military Affairs Committee took the matter under consideration, and held hearings with a view to ascertaining methods used by the board in reaching its conclusions.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] was chairman of the subcommittee. The subcommittee reported that it found nothing which would impeach the findings of this board of officers. The subcommittee's report was adopted by the Military Affairs Committee and the War Department was advised of this action.

Under date of August 7, 1935, the Department submitted at my request the draft of a bill carrying out the report of the board of officers and this bill was introduced by the Colorado Senators. I delivered the bill to them, in view of the fact that the school was recommended for location within their State. That bill authorized the Secretary of War to establish the Air Corps technical school at or near Denver and to accept on behalf of the United States free from incumbrance or conditions, and without cost to the United States, for the use as a site for the school, the title in fee simple to 640 acres of land, more or less, within the city of Denver.

The bill also authorizes the Secretary to accept a tract of land within the State of Colorado suitable for use as an aerial gunnery and bombing range by the Army Air Corps.

The committee felt, inasmuch as this board of Air Corps officers had found the present site unsuitable, and had found Denver the preferable location, after many months of study and personal investigation of numerous cities, that the bill should be enacted into law, and, therefore, we have favorably reported it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have a few observations which I trust can be made in a very short while. The Senate has heard my able colleague expressing reasons for opposing the motion of our eminent friends the Senators from Colorado.

At this time, Mr. President, it must not be overlooked that we are on the eve of closing this session of Congress. From the statement of the honorable Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee [Mr. SHEPPARD], the Senate must recognize that here was a proposition to remove an already established construction of the defense touching the Air Corps. It is situate in a State where there has been both the spirit of man and the construction by mechanics of this necessary defensive agency. In this State of Illinois and at Chanute sums of money must have been expended by the Government; proportional sums of money by the local government of the State and the community where this particular school is located. This is a school for the education of our young citizens, among other things, of defense—particularly of aviation.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that in this closing hour of Congress—certainly of this sitting—when we have bills of vast importance for consideration, should we not let a matter of this kind go until other Senators from the other States who are also competitors should be here and have an opportunity to be heard? Why should our honorable friend from Colorado upon this occasion bring up for passage a measure which has not been reached on the calendar, and when other Senators, I among the number, as the able Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs said——

Mr. SHEPPARD. Oh, yes; the bill has been reached once or twice before, and the Senator's colleague has objected.

Mr. LEWIS. It has not been reached today on a call of the calendar.

Mr. SHEPPARD. There has been no call of the calendar today.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It was reached yesterday on the call of the calendar.

Mr. LEWIS. Without that feature, though I would not stand on that, I ask the Senate is it fair that these other places, whatever they are, and other advocates, whoever they may be, should not be heard in the Senate in behalf of those other States that are applicants? Why should the Senator call this up at this particular time when no sufficient investigation can be afforded? Of what investigation has the able chairman of the committee informed us? That there was a committee of experts, so-called. This committee of experts took some course, we understand. Is there a possible chance this afternoon for the Senate to go into the matter of a comparison of the claims of Colorado with those of other States upon which it is said they reached the conclusion that Denver was superior to or of more profitable relation than any other city, in their judgment? Is there an opportunity here to ascertain upon which basis they reach that conclusion? Is there any effort to disclose that Illinois, the community whence it is assumed this school is to be taken, shall have opportunity to have Senators examine and deliberate its original status of deserts? What reason and on what equity is this attempt to rifle Chanute and rob Illinois of the location? I say none whatever. This community of Chanute, composed of noble citizens of industrious life of the highest character of citizenship, and sustained and conducted in civic morality and municipal integrity. Battling for years against all forms of agricultural depression, industrial oppression, the people of the enterprising town of Chanute and its sustaining territory gave all of heart and life to aid the Government in the administration of that school. What offense or omission of duty is charged against this deserving community that as penalty it should be invaded, besieged, and as an enemy camp shattered by dismemberment? The answer is, no commission, no omission of action on the part of Chanute calling for or excusing the infliction put upon it.

Under present circumstances we have not the opportunity such as we should have for examination nor of analysis of the experts and the reports. Likewise, we have no privilege here to examine any report of the War Department which may have been made on which we are to act. Should not this body have the opportunity fully where it can examine the reports, the reasons for the reports, the justification for them, and make its comparison as between its own judgment and the report of the so-called "experts"?

Mr. President, I have other reasons which I take the liberty to press upon the Senate as my personal reasons.

The great city of Denver we greatly admire. We express our admiration for the Senators from Colorado, its great advocates in this body. That is true not alone of Denver but of the State of Colorado likewise, and we express our approval in every form that those who speak of its merits or productions would request.

Mr. President, already the great State of Colorado has been provided with opportunity and places to contribute both the eminence of its intellect and the splendor of its kindnesses in both of those branches which go to the national defense. But is there not another feature to be considered? I present it, and therefore make bold before you to justify myself.

There is ever a cry on the Middle West and to the Mississippi Valley States that we, the Middle West, shall sustain the national defense and pay the tax levied. The first thing ever asked of us was that we should sustain the Navy, and then that we should sustain the Army. Every time anything is attempted in behalf of the national defense those representatives of the Middle West, seeing the manifest objection of its people to appropriations for such purposes, rise once again and cry out the need for the defense of the Nation and the expense needed and that it is justified.

In the great State of Illinois we have opportunities for the education of the farmer boy to make a sailor of him, and yet this proposed measure would initiate the effort to close the Midwest ports of the Gulf and Lakes against the education and advancement of their scholars and the education for marine duty of their citizens. Our Nation demands that the boy of the West shall give his life for the country, but shall not have an opportunity to be educated in order to qualify himself to defend himself and the Nation in the conflict. We have been able to defeat the destruction of Illinois' Great Lakes School of Education for the services in the Navy.

Now, sirs, turning to the Army, a field of the Army for which a certain site has been selected, its qualifications likewise had to be passed on by the Department before it was selected. It was thus chosen. Having selected upon these investigations, it had been, if you please, sirs, settled, the subject subscribed, and the buildings accepted. There they are, to the value of millions. What reason have we now for their destruction, and what shall we say to the Middle West who call upon us to aid in the national defense, to support the Army, when we are asked to remove this great fort from the Middle West which furnishes an opportunity for education at their very doorway? Why take this privilege out of the State and deprive the Mississippi Valley people, only on the assumption that it appears the advocates of Colorado have succeeded in bewitching the War Department to the theory that they have the best climate and possibly the healthiest region, in order to induce them in the exchange. If we are to engage in real-estate barter, let us create a real-estate exchange here at the Capitol, and let other communities bid as to who shall be the highest bidder.

The Senator from Colorado called attention to the fact that the great city of Denver has issued some bonds to pay the expenses as consideration to take over from the Government this field. We would call that bribery in private politics. What may we call it in this matter? The War Department is to move this improvement and take it away from the Middle West with no other reason or justification other than some experts give an opinion recommending such, all on some basis of which we have not time to examine, nor enter into the reasons or justifications. The opportunities of Senators to be heard are lacking entirely, and all of us submitted to adopt the conclusion of some bureau of manipulators in the War Department.

I ask, Is it fair to bring this measure up for consideration now, when the hearing essential must be so limited as under these circumstances, too limited to enable us to pass upon it, in view of the paucity of information to guide this honorable body?

For myself, with great deference for my eminent friend from Colorado, I regard it as an assault upon the opportunities for an adequate national defense, an attempt to take away from the great Mississippi Valley States what rightfully belongs there in this instance, the right to have the opportunity to educate their children and protect their homes.

For these reasons, I ask that action by the Senate be deferred until the whole subject may be gone into and information sufficient for our use brought before us, before the eminent Senator from Colorado as well as myself and my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. It may be that I can strike a note of harmony. Would it satisfy the Senators from Illinois and Colorado to compromise this matter and let the fort be located in New Orleans? [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the able Senator from Louisiana suggests that possibly, for harmony, we might have this fort removed to New Orleans. However, from what we read of Louisiana we would imagine of all places that exist in the United States in which there is the least harmony and cooperation touching the affairs of the Federal Government and this administration in Washington, it is certainly at New Orleans. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have submitted my views, and having submitted them on the basis suggested, I am sensitive about taking up the time of the Senate by uttering further remonstrances against the matter being brought up. I respectfully ask that the subject matter be not taken up now but be left for a later moment when properly it may be taken up and have due and proper consideration, for the reasons I have pointed out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3398.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, one may well hesitate to follow any eloquent address of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. He is always persuasive and is frequently compelling. I ought, however, to add a few further references to the report of the Army experts on the proposed Denver location of the Air Corps technical school.

The expert report to the committee, later approved by the committee, includes the deliberate conclusion that the very lives of young men of this country who enlist for technical air training are involved in the Senate's decision. Colonel Yount, of the Army, impressively so stated at one committee hearing. Among the important factors involved and carefully reviewed in the Army report are visibility, geographic and health advantages, strategic merits of location, important photographic facilities, emergency landing opportunities, and other elements conducive to morale and efficient training on which experts are exceptionally qualified to pass.

It should further be stated that no inducements, other than appropriate responses to requests for information, were offered by the citizens of Denver to invite a report favorable to the city of Denver. That decision was left, as was right, to the merits of the case, and only subsequent to the filing of that report, as before indicated, did the people of that fine municipality, in order to meet the decision announced by the technical experts of the War Department, tender, by vote of the taxpayers of the community, free from cost to the Federal Government, adequate sites and facilities for the purposes in view.

It must be added that there is at Rantoul, Ill., no suitable available aerial gunnery or bombing site. For those uses the city of Denver is tendering a bombing site 10 miles square—100 square miles—in which indispensable training and experiments of the Air Corps may be carried on under highly favorable conditions. No comparable area is at hand in the State of Illinois in the vicinity of Rantoul, nor can one be obtained without very substantial expense to the Government, since the region where Rantoul stands is one of rich agricultural lands which must necessarily be acquired by purchase or condemnation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator has stated one of the chief technical reasons for the location of the school at some other place than Chanute Field. The board of Air Corps officers found that there is no available location within a reasonable distance of this field for a bombing and machine-gun range. Such a range is essential to the proper operation of an institution of this character. The board also found that the climatic features of the present location are unsuitable for the successful completion of the needed training.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I thank the Senator from Texas for his confirmatory contribution.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the colloquy between the able Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee and the eminent representative of Denver discloses that on the one hand there was not the knowledge the other possessed; and apparently an admission on the one hand and a dispute on the other indicate the necessity of entering into this question generally in order to obtain full information, because the very suggestions of these two able Senators show how little we really know about the subject.

OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, while I was attending a meeting of the special committee, a measure was brought up to which it was known on the Senate floor that I was opposed, and a number of other Senators were opposed. That statement had been made by me to numerous persons, including the Senator who called up the joint resolution, the Chairman of the Commerce Committee, the Senator from New York

[Mr. COPELAND]. I am referring to Senate joint resolution 175, which provides for the continuance of certain contracts which the Postmaster General has reported to be fraudulent and made contrary to law.

I had gone to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and told him that I assumed the measure would not come up, but, if it did come up, I desired that he should object until I could return. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who was also opposed to the joint resolution, was called away and was in the Finance Committee. I cannot believe the Senate will permit this matter to stand as it now is, when it is known not only that I was opposed to it but that numerous other Senators were opposed to it, and I had given notice to the Senator from New York that if the matter should come up I should offer a substitute which I had in my hand at the time I talked to him.

Mr. President, I do not care to go into the debate at this time. I shall do so if the action shall be reconsidered, and I shall refer to some evidence which has just come out before the special committee in reference to this very joint resolution.

Under these conditions, I ask unanimous consent that the action by which the Senate passed Senate Joint Resolution 175, providing for the extension of the time for cancelation of the ocean-mail contracts, may be set aside, and that the joint resolution may be reinstated on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the votes by which Senate Joint Resolution 175 was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and passed be set aside, and the subsequent action on the joint resolution be reconsidered and that it be restored to the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object to his request, I have no objection at all to the Senator from Alabama presenting his case and his argument at any time. If it shall be sufficient to convince the Senate that there should be reconsideration, it will be appropriate to have it.

Mr. President, this is a matter of concern, and we are at the end of the session. Under the Independent Offices Act of 1934 it was provided that on April 30, 1935, the President might cancel or modify any mail contracts not in the public interest. On the 4th of March he sent in a message asking for the enactment of a ship-subsidy bill. Very shortly after that I had a letter from the Postmaster General calling my attention to the importance of speed in the preparation and passage of the proposed ship-subsidy bill, because of the approaching 30th of April, the dead line for cancelation or modification.

On receipt of that letter I went to see the President, reminding him of his message and told him of this letter I had had from the Postmaster General. I told the President it would be utterly impossible even to prepare a bill by the 30th of April, and certainly impossible to pass one. In view of recent events I think no Member of the Senate will doubt that I was right in my prophecy.

We then discussed the question of what should be done with the date of cancelation. The President was good enough to ask my advice about it, and I suggested that the cancelation date should be deferred for 1 year. The President said he was unwilling to have it go so long, because he thought it was important that the subsidy bill should be passed at once, and that it would facilitate the passage of the bill to have the provision of the independent offices act pending. He laughingly said, "You will be there until August anyhow, and you will have time enough to pass the bill." We are here in August, and we have not passed any bill.

Mr. President, it is not quite fair to impose upon the President of the United States the responsibility and the burden of acting in this matter. As I recall, there are 44 mail contracts, and different conditions attach to each.

The able Senator from Alabama has brought out an abundance of testimony which in his judgment justified the cancelation of the contracts. After he finished his work the Post Office Department made a further investigation. The law states, as I recall it, that the President may cancel or modify these contracts on 60 days' notice. The notice was given by the summoning of the contractors before the Post Office Department, where further hearings were had, as I have said.

More recently the Senator from Alabama, as chairman of the investigating committee, has had printed in three or four volumes the significant features of the Post Office Department investigation, together with the recommendations in each case.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Do I understand correctly that the Senator from New York objects to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. COPELAND. I may object to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that, while I am as anxious as he is to bring the matter to a conclusion, realizing that legislation on the subject of shipping cannot be passed during this session without a prolongation of the session, under the circumstances I think the Senator from Alabama should be afforded the opportunity to offer his amendment. I believe that the request should be granted, and that time will be saved by reopening the matter and considering it now.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have not the slightest objection to what is suggested to me by the able leader of our side, except that I do not wish anything in the nature of a filibuster to defeat final action. I do not think it is fair to the President to insist upon his acting upon these contracts on the 31st of October.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree with the Senator, but I do not anticipate any filibuster. I think the matter will be disposed of with reasonable promptness.

Mr. COPELAND. I have no objection at all if it is understood that the Senator from Alabama will make his presentation. If it is convincing to the Senate that some other procedure than the one my committee recommended be taken, and I say my committee, because I state to the Senate now that the joint resolution is not my measure, it is that of the committee, unanimously reported—if we may hope to have a determination of the matter and not simply have it delayed by a long debate, I am satisfied to let the matter come up as the Senator from Alabama desires.

May I ask the Senator from Alabama what his thought is in that connection?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, my thought is that during my absence, with an absolute knowledge that I objected to the joint resolution, and that not only did I object to it, but that I had a substitute to offer for it, advantage was taken of my absence, the joint resolution was passed, and not only was passed, but that a motion was made to reconsider and that motion was laid on the table.

My thought further is that under those conditions good faith requires that the action be set aside without conditions or stipulations, and I cannot see how anybody would ask that there be any stipulations under those circumstances.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wish to say further that I informed the Senator from Alabama today, at the beginning of the session, that I intended to bring the joint resolution up this afternoon.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator did not inform me that he intended to bring it up this afternoon. He said he intended to bring it up before we left, and I told the Senator that I intended to offer a substitute when it came up, and, so far as I know, there was not even a quorum called. As a matter of fact, I was away, but if a quorum had been called, even, there might have been some excuse.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate the viewpoint of the Senator from New York in desiring to secure action on the proposed legislation, but may I point out to him that with only a day left, and with many of us interested in bills on the calendar which are important, which we would like to have considered, this discussion is taking on the nature of a filibuster against our bills. I know the Senator does not so intend, but I ask him if he will not think of those bills, which have not as yet had a chance. I was on the floor ready to call up a bill I wanted to have considered when the Senator was recognized. I was glad to have the Senator get the floor and get his matter attended to, but I do not think it is fair to the others of us here that further time be taken by a discussion as to whether or not a unanimous-consent agreement shall be entered into.

Conference reports and many other matters may come in, and if we do not get some action before long it will amount to a denial of action on the bills which some of us want to have passed. I appeal to the Senator to consider this in arriving at his decision.

Mr. COPELAND. I fully appreciate what the Senator has said. I, too, have bills I desire to have considered. I have here an important bill, the flood-control measure, which I hope to have passed, and have been instructed by my committee to do all I can to have it passed. But I do not wish to have the idea entertained by anyone that the Senator from Alabama has been mistreated in this matter. I told him when I came into the Senate Chamber this afternoon that I intended to bring up this joint resolution. I was told of several Senators who were supposed to be in opposition to the joint resolution, and I took occasion to confer with those Senators. Some of them were on the floor when the motion was made.

If Senators desire to go ahead with a long debate in this matter, I have no objection. I am seeking merely to save embarrassment to the President of the United States in asking him to act on this matter if we can spare him that duty by passing a ship-subsidy bill. He should not be asked to do that unless we fail to enact a new Merchant Marine Act.

I know the purpose of the Senator from Alabama, and I respect him for any view he may hold. It is his desire to terminate these contracts, these solemn contracts which have been made between these various companies and the Government.

I ask my leader what he desires me to do in the matter, I leave the matter in his hands.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have already indicated that I think the best course to pursue is to grant the request of the Senator from Alabama and let the matter be considered on its merits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the votes by which the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed, to be read a third time, and passed are reconsidered, and the vote whereby the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table is also reconsidered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from New York. I have no objection to the measure of the Senator from Colorado, now before the Senate, being concluded, but I think that following that the joint resolution of the Senator from New York should be taken up, and that the Senator from Alabama should be afforded opportunity for offering his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2398.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, before the motion is put, I desire to be heard briefly. No one knows better than I the beauties of the State of Colorado, the breadth of its plains, and the height of its mountains.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed with the joint resolution of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 175) to extend the time within which contracts may be modified or canceled under the provisions of section 5 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I have sent for the substitute which I desire to offer. I desire to say at the outset that no one is more desirous to relieve the President from the embarrassment suggested than am I. It is my belief that the joint resolution but plunges him into embarrassment from which it is impossible for anyone to rescue him.

There will be two questions to state in order to arrive at the real issue on the joint resolution as presented and my substitute for it. The joint resolution of the Senator from New York would extend the status quo which now exists under the law, as indicated, under the Independent Offices Appropriation Act. Under that the President was given a certain period of time within which he could pass upon whether or not the ocean-mail contracts should be canceled. That time, if I am not mistaken, has already been extended once. The resolution of the Senator from New York would extend the date authorizing the President to cancel those contracts until April 1, 1936.

The substitute for the joint resolution which I shall offer would cancel the contracts effective April 1, 1936. In other words, the resolution offered by the Senator from New York imposes upon the President the responsibility to cancel the contract and shifts it from the shoulders of the Congress, which ought to be willing to take its own responsibility.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. If I understand correctly the difference between the joint resolution and the proposed substitute, under the joint resolution offered by the Senator from New York the contracts will become permanent on April 1, 1936, unless the President shall take affirmative action looking to their cancelation. Under the substitute offered by the Senator from Alabama the contracts will terminate on April 1, 1936, unless in the meantime Congress shall take affirmative action either to continue them or otherwise.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the Senator's substitute printed?

Mr. BLACK. No. I will send it forward now and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That on March 31, 1936, all contracts made by the Postmaster General pursuant to the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act, 1928, for the carriage of mail shall stand rescinded, and it shall be unlawful for any officer of the Government to pay from any public funds any compensation to the holder of any such contract for the carriage of ocean mail except on voyages that commenced prior to March 31, 1936. Any contractor whose contract is rescinded may, within 1 year from the passage of this resolution, be entitled to sue the United States for any just compensation under said contract to which such contractor may show himself entitled, in the manner provided for by paragraph 20 of section 41 and section 250 of title 28 of the United States Code. The claimant and the United States shall have the right in such court to set up and have determined and adjusted by the court all legal and equitable claims, differences, offsets, credits, and recoupments to which either may be entitled, to the end that all conflicting claims, assertions, and rights may be fully, fairly, and completely settled and adjudged by the court. The jurisdiction of said court is hereby limited to an award of just compensation, which compensation shall not include any allowance for prospective or speculative future profits that might have been realized by the claimant if permitted further to perform his contract.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow the resolution of the Senator from New York to be read now so we may have both measures before us?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Florida, I ask that the original joint resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 5 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, as amended, be amended by striking out "October 31, 1935" and inserting in lieu thereof "April 30, 1936".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to discuss the proposed substitute amendment. It seems to me that the issue so far as the two measures are concerned is clear. Therefore, it becomes proper to discuss the reasons for each. I shall be glad to state the issue again.

Under the joint resolution of the Senator from New York the President's authority to cancel the ocean-mail contracts is extended until April 30, 1936. Under the proposed substitute offered by me the contracts are canceled effective April 1, 1936, with the right on the part of each contractor to go into the courts, where the contractors and the Government may assert their claims, and the court may determine for itself, on the evidence, if there were damages, if the contract was justly canceled, if there was fraud as found by the Postmaster General; and, if there was fraud, whether or not there were any damages and whether they should be paid.

Under the joint resolution of the Senator from New York the burden is on the President. Under the proposed substitute the Congress takes the burden upon itself.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. Assuming that the President should not cancel the contracts under the committee joint resolution on or before April 30, what would be the effect?

Mr. BLACK. My judgment is that if the President should not cancel the contracts they would remain in effect under the old law, continuing to operate just as they have been, and there would be no possibility of any court granting to the Government the great damages which have been inflicted upon it by individuals, some of whom stand upon the evidence as having reached their hands down into the United States Treasury and taken money for which they did not give an honest return.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Under the original act, as I recall, the President was empowered to cancel the contracts if he reached the conclusion they ought to be canceled, but he was given the power to adjust the contracts, to make new contracts, and make new arrangements, was he not?

Mr. BLACK. He could continue them if they were in the public interest.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes, or he could adjust them by mutual agreement. Under the Senator's amendment the contractor is simply relegated to his right to sue for damages. The contract must be canceled. In other words, we tell a man who has a contract with the Government, "That contract ends at a certain date whether you are damaged or not, and if you are damaged you can go to court about it"; but under the original act and under the joint resolution as it is offered now, adjustments may be made before the contracts are canceled and, therefore, the contractor has a right to negotiate with the Government with reference to the contract and ascertain the damages, if there are any damages, and to come to an understanding and agreement about those contracts, and make new contracts if necessary. Under the Senator's amendment the contracts are simply canceled, right or wrong, and the contractor is relegated to the court for damages.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator would be correct were it not for the fact that I have fixed the date for cancelation at a time when the Congress may try to enact legislation without being restrained by pernicious lobbyists of the shippers, or the operators who are here now, and have been here all the week—in fact, all during the session—and who are setting themselves up as able to keep the Congress from legislating on this matter. I am not guessing about this. They are here studying the bills even before they reach the floor of the Senate or the committee, according to the sworn evidence before the investigating committee this afternoon.

Under the resolution which I have offered the contracts are to be canceled effective April 1, but in the meantime Congress may enact a new law. A bill was proposed several days ago which had the approval of the Commerce Department and the Post Office Department. The shipping people objected to it. Not only did they object to it here, but they called California over the long-distance telephone and told their representatives there that they objected to the bill and discussed with them then how they could beat the bill and have passed the particular joint resolution which I am now fighting. That evidence came from Mr. Patchin a few moments ago in room 357 of the Senate Office Building.

Not satisfied with the law which gave them the right to negotiate, as that proposal did, they would still have the right to negotiate under a law which Congress can enact between now and April, and will have some incentive to enact, rather than having the shipping people here using their influence to defeat all legislation of any kind. I regret very much to say that that influence is great, too great.

Mr. Dollar is here. Mr. Patchin is here. Mr. Lykes was here last week. Gentlemen from Georgia have been here. A gentleman from New Orleans has been here whose name, I believe, was Tedrick. They have been flocking and lobbying around the committee doors. They have had their paid attorney here practically since the very first day a bill was introduced in either House.

Mr. President, in order that there may be no misunderstanding let me state that I favor a merchant marine, but when we put our hands down into the United States Treasury I favor that money being used to build a merchant marine instead of being used to line the pockets of favored individuals who have political influence and political power. I charge that that has been done for the last 10 years.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I am 100 percent in accord with what the Senator is saying. The Senator is correct in everything I have heard him say up to this time, though I did not hear his entire speech. The only thing I have been disappointed about is that the I. M. M., who are the chief beneficiaries of all this business, never seem to be brought in as having anything to do with this unsavory mess. Does the Senator agree with that statement?

Mr. BLACK. The evidence taken a few moments ago showed that about 10 days ago there was a meeting in the city of New York. Present at the meeting were Mr. Ira Campbell, the chief attorney for the Shipping Operators' Association; Mr. Heiman, who has been acting in some kind of special capacity for the Department of Commerce; Mr. Raymond Moley; Mr. Kermit Roosevelt; and, as I recall, Mr. John Franklin. They were discussing the kind of legislation the Congress should enact with reference to a ship subsidy. We find their representatives here day after day, week after week, month after month.

I deny that the position I am taking is one which will embarrass the President. I assert, on the contrary, that the President of the United States does not know now and never has favored the abuses which have been heaped upon the people of this country in the maladministration of the law which was enacted.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Without taking any side on the Senator's substitute for the joint resolution sponsored by the Senator from New York, I did not infer from the Senator's remarks that he intended to convey the impression that the men who represent the shipping industry were doing anything wrong in having a meeting in New York, nor that they were not acting within their rights in coming to Washington as often as they pleased to see legislators and express the views which they might have.

Assuming that to be the position of the Senator, may I ask if they have wrongfully come to Washington in the presentation of those views?

Mr. BLACK. I may say to the Senator in connection with these laws that I do not think a man who has made $1,000 grow into millions of dollars on Government largess and Government securities is the man to pass upon the kind of legislation that should be enacted. I do not think a man who has taken a commission for himself of more than $700,000 for the purchase of Government ships is the kind of man who ought to be reading and passing upon a bill to be introduced before that bill is submitted to a committee of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. They certainly are entitled to come here and give their side of the matter. Further than that, it was only a short while ago that the farmers of the United States, many of whom had received subsidies, came to Washington and went to the President in a meeting outside the White House. Under the circumstances which called this Congress into long session, if we are to deny any of those who receive governmental benefits from coming to Washington, there will be only about 10 people who will be permitted to come here.

Mr. BLACK. It may be that the Senator, if he knew the facts, would approve what has been going on. It may be that he would think our legislation ought to be held up and that gentlemen who are drawing huge subsidies, lining their pockets with millions of dollars which they did not earn, should take a position that we must enact no legislation at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Whether they took it rightfully or whether they took it wrongfully or whether the policy we have is a good one or is a bad one, I still imagine they have a right, as men out of jail and free citizens, to come and talk to Senators and Representatives whenever their interests are involved, and to give their viewpoint; and I assume Senators will have sufficient intelligence to weigh the viewpoints and act according to the arguments presented, and in the light of all the facts, before voting for or against the legislation which these gentlemen may desire.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, as I was saying, Congress may decide whether it wishes still further to dillydally along and permit contracts to remain in existence which, after a full, fair, and complete investigation by the Post Office Department, with the claimants represented by attorneys presenting the evidence they desired, the Department has reported without a single exception were illegally entered into, and recommended that they be canceled.

That is the situation we have here. I had printed and placed on the desk of each Senator the reports of the Postmaster General. He showed the huge profits which had been made by individuals from these subsidies. He showed the huge income which had gone into the pockets of certain individuals. He found in every instance that the contract had been made under such circumstances that it might be canceled. That report was made months and months ago; and now it is again proposed to continue to let these individuals dip their hands into the Treasury.

I do not care whether or not they have the right to come to Washington. That is immaterial to this discussion. It is proposed to let them continue to dip their hands into the Federal Treasury under the same old law with the same old contracts, which ought long ago to have been repudiated, which have been proven to be fraudulent, under which, instead of the money going to build ships to give us a merchant marine of which we might well be proud, it has gone to line the pockets of persons who have kept their lobbyists in Washington, at Government agencies, Government departments, Government committee rooms, and everywhere else they could send them, week after week, month after month, and year after year.

I tell Senators, when they vote on this matter they need not let anybody fool them. They are voting on whether they approve the continuation of contracts which the Postmaster General, after a long, full, and complete hearing, has reported without any exception were illegally entered into and ought to be canceled.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is familiar with these contracts, and in many respects I am not.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask the Senator if, under the contracts, the Postmaster General or the President has the power to void them?

Mr. BLACK. It is my judgment that the Government, through its duly constituted agency, has a right, whether it is expressed in the contract or not, to cancel contracts which are entered into through fraud.

Mr. TYDINGS. Even if there is no fraud, do not the contracts contain a provision similar to the provision in the old air mail contracts, that on 3 months' notice—I am not sure of the time—the Postmaster General may cancel them?

Mr. BLACK. There are many contracts with many different stipulations. I desire to state very frankly to the Senator that, in my judgment, under the contracts themselves, it is very doubtful in my mind if there would be a right to cancel them, except for fraud in entering into them.

Mr. TYDINGS. If there has been fraud—and we all concede that the contracts may be canceled if there has been fraud—and the Attorney General wishes the contracts canceled because there has been fraud, I can see no reason for any legislation to cancel them. If there has been fraud, the Attorney General or the President or the Postmaster General ought to cancel them.

Mr. BLACK. I think I can show the Senator the situation we should be in if that were done. That is the reason why, personally, I have been exceedingly anxious that legislation be passed at this session of Congress. It is for that reason that although I am opposed to a subsidy in principle, and have not voted for subsidies, I myself agreed that if a subsidy bill should be brought into the Senate which would protect the public interests, I would state to the Senate that, in my judgment, it would be better to pass that kind of a bill, even though the principle was wrong, than to permit conditions to go on as they now are.

Here is the situation we should be in: Let us suppose that all these contracts should be canceled today. Under the existing law we should have to proceed again under the same old act of 1928, which, in my judgment, is not suitable to build up a merchant marine. The result would be that we should have a state of complete chaos. It would be necessary for advertisements to go out. In order for them to be legitimate and honest, they would have to be drawn in such a way as to permit honest, bona fide competitive bidding. That would take time. In the meantime there would be no contracts at all with any of these companies. It is for that reason that, while I think they should be canceled, I have thought and still believe they ought to be canceled, effective as of a future date, so that we shall have time to enact legislation on the subject.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have in mind this situation in particular:

About 5 or 6 years ago, a group of business men in Baltimore thought it wise to establish a passenger and freight line running between Baltimore and the ports of Europe. They had no ships, as I recall, but were anxious to buy some ships which the Government had tied up. The Government was equally anxious to sell the ships. So these gentlemen put up a sum of money, and borrowed a sum of money in addition from the Government; and having sufficient capital they agreed to cut the ships in half, and enlarge them, and put in new engines, and then establish a line between Baltimore and the ports of Europe.

As a condition precedent to that arrangement, the Government gave them a contract. Upon the assurance of that contract, the degree of capital they expended in those ships was predicated; namely, they figured out how they could operate the ships, what size ships, the number of ships, and the speed of the ships.

I do not know whether or not the company has made any profit; but I know that less than a year ago they were on the point of handing the ships back to the Government, because I went with the president of the company to the Secretary of Commerce. They were going to hand the ships back to the Government, lose all the investment they had put in the ships—which amounted to many hundreds of thousands of dollars—and simply say, "We cannot perform the remainder of the contract. This corporation is in liquidation." However, the Government then permitted the shipping company to call at several additional European ports, and enough extra business was obtained so that the concern could keep its head above water. Therefore, if that contract is to be set aside it means that that particular shipping line is going into the hands of a receiver.

The Senator from Alabama may be right, and probably is, because he has made a study of this matter, in his statement that there are grave abuses in the mail-contract situation; but I do not wish to vote for any blanket proposition on the subject after men have honestly gone into an enterprise of this kind, and tried to make a go of a new line competing with foreign lines, and have them wiped off the sea, and have the commerce of the State of Maryland and the Middle West and the far West which comes to that port carried by foreign shipping lines. This particular line, I believe, has succeeded in driving most of the foreign shipping off the Chesapeake and the Atlantic adjacent to the Chesapeake, but if this line should go into the hands of receivers the foreign lines would be back immediately; and this concern has not made millions of dollars.

It has been on the verge of suspending its operations on several occasions, when I have gone down to see the Secretary of Commerce to see if they could not get new ports of call abroad so that they could obtain sufficient revenue to keep the line intact, and, in the absence of securing the right to call at other foreign ports, the president of the company was on the verge of tying up all the ships, and telling the Government to take them for the mortgages it had on them. That may be an isolated case only. I suggest it for whatever it is worth. At any rate, if we are to have a policy of Government aid, I certainly do not want that policy wiped out unless some policy comparable to the one which encouraged these men to go into the shipping business is to be substituted for it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that the evidence shows that these men were not encouraged by the Government to go into the shipping business. They were encouraged by the Roosevelt Steamship Co.

Mr. TYDINGS. It does not make any difference who encouraged them, the Government loaned them money and gave them a contract.

Mr. BLACK. Let me answer the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is the encouragement to which I am referring.

Mr. BLACK. May I state that I am satisfied that if the Senator would read the evidence in this case, even though the company is in his own State——

Mr. TYDINGS. Very well; what is the evidence?

Mr. BLACK. I know his integrity and his honesty, and in my judgment he would be standing here with me saying just what I say with reference to the contract down in my State; every one of the contracts ought to be canceled, including the one with the Baltimore line.

Mr. TYDINGS. Was there any fraud in the Baltimore proposition?

Mr. BLACK. I do not know. I have an idea that when people get things by political pressure instead of on merit, there is fraud. I may be wrong.

Mr. TYDINGS. Labor, and capital, and the farmer, and the utilities, and everybody else, get things by political pressure.

Mr. BLACK. Perhaps they get their contracts by political pressure, but if the time has come in the history of this Government when anyone will stand on the Senate floor and defend the making of a Government contract to pay out Government money, money collected from the taxpayer, if he is convinced that the contract was not made on merit, but was made by political pressure, then I say that the country has reached a very low state.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think these contracts were made through political pressure, and I do not know of any evidence to show it.

Mr. BLACK. Let me read a little evidence to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. I happen to know that when this line was about to be inaugurated the Senators from many States were interested in seeing the line there, and the shippers were, and if the Senator considers that attending conferences was political pressure to bring a service to the people of the community, then it was political pressure. I consider that all right. If there is any fraud connected with it, I am not conversant with it. That would give it a different complexion.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I want to say that I read a great deal of the evidence before the Senator from Alabama made his presentation. The only surprise I had was that the Senator from Alabama did not bring this matter here earlier. I wish to say, further, that while my estimation for the Senator from Alabama has always been pretty high, it has increased a hundred percent because of the nonpartisan way in which he is exposing what I conceive to be the most universal fraud ever conducted, and those who perpetrated it dominated certain mastheads of the Democratic administration, and the Republican administration before it, and saw to it that when the changes were made they stayed in the saddle to continue the fraud. There is not an honest thing about it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. These contracts were made under the Hoover administration.

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. This is the first time I have ever known that I had any particular influence with that administration, as I was very much in opposition to it, particularly in its last days.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I want to tell the Senator how little influence he had. Along about that time I thought I was a factor in helping to push along one of these contracts, and found out that a Senator in this body helping to get it through wound up with a $5,000 check from one of them to help beat me in my campaign down there. That is about how much the Senator from Maryland is going to find that he had to do with it. The chances are that someone of his enemies in his home town will be getting money with which to fight him.

Mr. BLACK. I have not time to read the evidence, but I just ran across this:

On September 16, 1929, Mr. John M. Franklin wrote to Mr. Walter S. Franklin, his uncle, concerning the delay in securing the route to be certified by the Postmaster General. The following is quoted from the letter:

"The consequent delays are exceedingly unfortunate, but cannot be avoided, as neither Kermit nor I feel that we ought to undertake to bring pressure to bear from political friends until it is apparent no further headway can be made through the Post Office Department."

I just ran onto that.

Mr. TYDINGS. That was a pretty good letter. They did not want to use any other outside influence, if delays could be avoided.

Mr. LONG. They were being nice for the time being.

Mr. BLACK. Here is another:

I talked with Mr. Glover on the telephone this morning, and he said no political pressure was necessary.

Mr. TYDINGS. It looks as if there was not as much fraud as the Senator thought there was up to that point.

Mr. BLACK. What about Mr. Glover?

I talked with Mr. Glover on the telephone this morning and he said no political pressure was necessary, and he would let us know when he wanted us to act. I told him you will write him as per our conversation yesterday, and he said that was good.

This shows how everything is done:

We should play up to the fact that the Baltimore Trust Co. was the prime mover in the establishment of this mail route; and that they asked the Roosevelt Steamship Co. to handle the matter in Washington for them, and that it was at all times distinctly understood that the ships would be run from Baltimore by a Baltimore concern, and that the Pennsylvania Railroad is interested and will do all it can to help.

As a matter of fact, they were run by the International Mercantile Marine through its subsidiary, the Roosevelt Steamship Co.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is not well informed. It just happens that I know considerable about that steamship company, if not more than he does.

The Baltimore Trust Co. today has a million-dollar investment in that steamship company, and the Baltimore Trust Co. is in the hands of a receiver. The only way that million dollars is going to be gotten for the stockholders is by making that concern pay it out.

Mr. BLACK. The only way they will get it will be to get it out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me correct the Senator. Furthermore, the president of that company was the president of the Baltimore Trust Co. Furthermore, the founders of that company who induced the Pennsylvania Railroad and other concerns to invest in it were officials, I think, of the Baltimore Trust Co. So it was a Maryland concern.

True, they acted under a company in New York as a subsidiary, because they thought it wise to have experienced steamship people.

It has not paid hundreds of thousands of dollars to any stockholder or holding company, and the real money in that concern came out of the investors in Baltimore City, where $1,000,000 of the capital stock is held today in one of the large banks there.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator may think he knows all about it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not say I knew all about it.

Mr. BLACK. I suggest the Senator read the evidence.

Mr. TYDINGS. What is the evidence?

Mr. BLACK. Let us see about this thing. Does the Senator know how much has been paid out in management fees to the International Mercantile Marine?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think I have a pretty good idea of that.

Mr. BLACK. Has the Senator been told recently?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have seen the statement.

Mr. BLACK. Has anyone told the Senator recently?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not asked recently.

Mr. BLACK. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that if he will investigate and find out how the money has been siphoned up to the International Mercantile Marine in management fees, it might interest him.

I admit that no riches have gone into the hands of the Baltimore people. The Roosevelt Steamship Co. got the money, although Mr. Simonton and his bank did serve as agents of the company in various ways.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I correct the Senator in another statement? If he will look at the advertising expenses of the Baltimore Mail Steamship Line he will find that all the propaganda and pamphlets, and what not, and advertisments were paid for, not out of the little company but out of the big company, and he will find that that company was about as honestly run as any business in the United States. There are plenty of inquisitive people in Maryland today with an interest in that million dollars of nonpaying stock who would be only too quick to take the matter into court if there had been any fraud, and it has never been in court yet.

Mr. BLACK. Let me read a statement showing the financial condition of this company about which the Senator is talking. He said somebody put $1,000,000 in it. This is one which really did not make the money. The money which has been made out of this fund has been made by the company up above, the International Mercantile Marine.

Net worth of the Baltimore Mail Steamship Co. as at June 30, 1934	$1,515,931.29
Amount unpaid to the United States Shipping Board on construction loan notes relating to the 5 vessels now in operation	6,153,097.19

In addition to that, I might recall just one circumstance which I happen to remember which touched on this line, that a pass went to an employee of the United States Government whose duty it was to pass upon various things with reference to the United States Lines, and, as I recall, that United States Government employee was discharged when it was finally discovered that a pass had been given him over this line at the very time that he was engaged in passing upon the business of this company. That may be all clean and honest and upright and just, and such as to make tears come from the eyes of all those who learn about this glorious company, with its clean, honest, and magnificent record, which gives a pass to a Government employee and causes him to lose his position.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield for another speech.

Mr. TYDINGS. No, Mr. President. May I point out to the Senator that he is again misinformed? He has read that there has been about one and a half million dollars put into the company after $6,000,000 coming from the Federal Government. Let the Senator also bear in mind that the money put into the company, one and a half million dollars, is secondary money, and that the money owing to the Government is primary money, and that the investors cannot get a penny out of the sale of the property for the one and a half million dollars they have invested until the Government gets its $6,000,000. In other words, they put their money behind the Government money, which is about the best evidence of good faith anyone can wish.

Mr. BLACK. Also the money they put in, which is not quite as much as the Senator thinks, comes behind the money that goes to the Roosevelt Steamship Co. and to the International Mercantile Marine.

Mr. TYDINGS. How much went to the Roosevelt Co. and to the International Mercantile Marine?

Mr. BLACK. Evidently someone has told the Senator something about the facts in reference to this particular company. I suggest that the Senator read the evidence and find out what the sworn evidence was rather than to take someone else's statement for it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wish to take the statement of the Senator from Alabama for it. I desire to know.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator indicated he desired the Congress to adjourn sometime ago. If I should go into details with reference to the contracts, which happen to be in the State of each Senator here, it would take a long time. There happens to be one in Florida with Lykes Bros. I might have to go into the details of that with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. And then I might have to go into the details of the companies in New York with the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], and then I might have to go into the details with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] concerning the companies in Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. The Senator does not need to give me that information. I know about them.

Mr. BLACK. I shall read what the Postmaster General found, which may be interesting.

This contract may be canceled without any offer of compensation for the following reasons:

This conclusion is based on the evidence.

(a) This contract was a negotiated contract and awarded without authority.

In other words, the law said they should be competitive. It was not competitive. It was a negotiated contract based on political influence and political pressure.

Mr. TYDINGS. How could it be competitive if that is the only line running out of the city of Baltimore?

Mr. BLACK. It could be competitive. Somebody else could have had a chance to bid except this one company. There were 120,000,000 people in the United States. Certainly somebody else would have had a right to bid against them.

Mr. TYDINGS. With no ships?

Mr. BLACK. Should a contract be drawn in such way as to let it only to a man who happened to get a few old ships which the Government used to own, and whose main object was to sell some ships which had been bought from the Government?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Government was getting nothing for the ships when they were tied up.

Mr. BLACK. It is getting precious little now.

Mr. TYDINGS. It got millions of dollars.

Mr. BLACK. It gets very little now.

Mr. TYDINGS. Well, whatever the figure was.

Mr. BLACK. How much was it?

Mr. TYDINGS. Further than that, they spent millions on the ships and gave the Government a mortgage. So instead of having nothing, the Government got a mortgage on something that was worth millions. That is the difference.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is defending a single contract which happened to be in the State of Maryland. Here is what the Postmaster General said about it after he heard the evidence, and the same lawyers who represent them now represented them before the Postmaster General. They presented their evidence. They were given ample opportunity to present their evidence. He said, first, that the contract can be canceled because the contract was a negotiated contract and awarded without authority. I say if that be true, it is a fraudulent contract. Honesty and decency demand that it be canceled at the earliest possible moment. Is a contract honestly obtained if all one has to do to get it is simply to negotiate it with political pressure, and say, "The time is not ripe yet; wait a little longer and we will bring our politicians later; just a little later, Mr. Glover", and Mr. Glover says, "You do not need to bring them yet", and then to bring them later and have the hearing? The Postmaster General, after the evidence sworn to, makes the report to the Senate:

(a) This contract was a negotiated contract and awarded without authority.

The negotiated contract is a false contract when the law requires it to be competitive. Let us see the next clause.

(b) The contract was illegally transferred and assigned to the subcontractor.

That is the second clause.

(c) Full performance is not required in the public interest.

(d) Savings may be effected in the sum of $8,772,984.85, which is the estimated excess contract pay over the American poundage rates for the balance of the contract term.

In other words, take the one single contract which has been mentioned here, which is in question here, the one single contract which a Senator stood up on the floor to defend, and we find that that contract was awarded contrary to law by negotiation. Instead of complying with the law, calling for an honest open competitive bid, it was negotiated following a slimy, slick trail of political pressure.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator mean that I was slimy?

Mr. BLACK. Oh, no. I said "political pressure."

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the contract is as the Postmaster General says it is, ought not the Attorney General to take judicial notice and the Postmaster General forthwith cancel it?

Mr. BLACK. I wish to state something, since the Senator has brought it up, which I did not intend to say. I now invite the Comptroller General to take notice not only of this contract but of every other contract, and I state that, in my judgment, if he performs his duty not one dollar more will be paid under a single one of them.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. If perforce, the contracts are illegal, and the Postmaster General says they are illegal, and the Attorney General agrees they are illegal, they ought to be canceled. I am not here to defend illegal contracts.

Mr. BLACK. That is what I am talking about now.

Mr. TYDINGS. But what I am talking about is that the Senator ought not to assume that these contracts are fraudulent because, forsooth, they acted in good faith and the Postmaster General at the time did not know what his duties were.

Mr. BLACK. I do not agree that the Postmaster General did not know what his duties were. I think he knew what his duties were, but I do not think he performed his duties, and I think all the gentlemen who were pursuing this course and were saying, "Do not let anybody know where we are; put someone else up in front" knew the situation. I think they knew what their duties were. I think they knew there was a duty owing to the taxpayers, to the honest, decent people of this country. That duly required honesty and good faith on the part of the officials and on the part of not only the officials but those who dealt with them. There is a correlative duty.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. As I understand, these contracts were all made by the regularly established agencies of the country—the Shipping Board and the Postmaster General. I am not saying they are valid contracts. I am saying that is the process through which they were formulated. They went through the hands of the Government authorities that were charged with the duty of making them. The other parties themselves joined in the contracts with the Government authority in perfect good faith, so far as I know. The Senator alluded, for instance, to Lykes Bros. Lykes Bros. I know perfectly well, and I never heard any reflection on them.

Mr. BLACK. I will be glad for the Senator to read the sworn evidence in the record.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am speaking of them because the Senator alluded to them. I simply want to say that I am interested in this thought and idea: I do not want to see the American merchant marine destroyed or seriously crippled. I do not want to see the flag of the United States taken off the high seas. That concern has 42 ships in operation on 5 established routes, 1 to the Orient, 1 to the Mediterranean, and others to ports in Europe.

My information is that those 42 ships are barely making expenses with the benefit of the ocean-mail contracts. The operators are not getting rich. They are losing money. They would not be operating at all if the Government contracts were taken away from them.

I do not want to see 42 ships on 5 American routes absolutely taken out of service and the business turned over to foreign ships. That would be the result if we should cancel these contracts now. I am perfectly willing that the contracts should all be investigated and the facts developed and negotiations had whereby adjustment might be had with the contractors on some reasonable basis, if possible; and if not, leave them to the courts. If we cancel the contracts now and the ships have to go out of service, we will have taken the American flag off the seas.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator with reference to Lykes Bros. that of all the sordid stories that have ever been revealed before any committee in Washington, the story of the Lykes Bros. contract ranks at the top. It is my conclusion, drawn from the sworn evidence and the evidence of Lykes Bros. themselves, that these contracts were not competitive. On the contrary, from their sworn evidence, it will be found that they did not want them to be competitive. Let me read just a little statement about that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, before the Senator does that will he yield for a question? I desire to get some information.

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is it the Senator's interpretation that under these contracts the President may cancel them at any time?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; it is my judgment that the President could do so.

Mr. TYDINGS. Without any action on the part of Congress at all?

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. Does the Senator mean to say that the President knows of the irregularities to which he alludes and that knowing about them requested cancelation of the contracts?

Mr. BLACK. I have told the Senator, and I will tell him again, that the President has urged that some legislation be enacted so the matter might be settled. I happen to know that the President asked the Department of Commerce and the Post Office Department to agree upon a bill. They did agree upon a bill. The bill upon which they agreed contains exactly the same provision for cancelation that I have offered in my substitute amendment, except that instead of providing the date shall be as of April 1 it is provided that a certain number of days shall elapse after the passage of the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. I suppose the reason why the President has not acted heretofore is that rather than throw the whole thing out of line he wanted some new legislation.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. So that, even though the things were irregular in some respects, it would have been a serious blow to our merchant marine to have canceled them overnight.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. Until he could find some other method of arranging the situation, the President did not want to act?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wanted to raise that point because the Senator was leaving us under the impression that the President knew about these irregularities and did not act.

Mr. BLACK. I am glad the Senator did that. I am trying to make it clear that the President wants a law enacted. He has so stated to many Senators and Representatives, and has so stated publicly and in a message. The bill came here Tuesday afternoon and was delivered to the Chairman of the Commerce Committee. If the Senator will examine it as it has been printed, he will find in it the same provision for cancelation that I have in the substitute amendment which I have offered.

I am not trying to throw this matter into a state of chaos, although, in my judgment, every single contract is filled with fraud and reeking with corruption. At the same time I think it is necessary and essential that we postpone the cancelations for a sufficient length of time to enable Congress to enact a good law which would give each one of the contractors his day in court to obtain such damages as he may be able to prove. My amendment to the joint resolution would not cut him off from that right; it is expressly drawn with the idea of giving them the benefit of every possible right which may be theirs.

Even though the special committee investigated and reported the contracts were fraudulent, even though the Postmaster General investigated through witnesses from both sides under oath and reported that the contracts should be canceled, still, what I am suggesting is that they be canceled 6 months hence, giving Congress time to enact a proper law which would protect the people of the United States and would at the same time not drive the American flag from the seas. The sad and tragic thing about the whole dismal story is that the American flag has been driven from the seas while the people have paid money in order to have it float upon the seas all over the world. It is being driven from the seas because of the fact that contracts were improvidently made which permitted ships to be operated that were not fit to be classed as first-class American vessels, and permitted many men to line their pockets with wealth which should have gone into the construction of ships to be the pride of the American people, who want their flag to be carried aloft on the seas.

I am not speaking against an American merchant marine. I am speaking for a merchant marine, built on a solid foundation of honesty and decency. I have always believed that we could not construct a building which would stand upon pillars of fraud or deceit or irregularity, or privilege to some and injustice to others.

Something was said about Lykes Bros. Let me show the Alladin's lamp that was held in Lykes' hands by reason of governmental favoritism. Let me show how, like the fabled man of old, whatever he touched seemed to turn to gold:

The initial and only investment in the Lykes Steamship Co., other than from subsequent profits derived from steamship operations—

I may say that this credit appeared in another hearing. They have been given credit for part of this money which came from the Government. The initial and only investment was $115,439.

The net profit, before income taxes from all steamship operations, including operation under mail contracts nos. 23 and 45 from October 1918 to June 30, 1933, was $6,625,936.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat the first figure?

Mr. BLACK. It was $115,000.

Mr. LONG. They paid out $115,000 and took in $6,000,000 profit?

Mr. BLACK. It was $6,625,000, and a part of the $115,000 came from the United States Government.

Now, let me read how that contract was made. I will read from Mr. Lykes' testimony. Certainly no one will question it.

Thereafter the following discussion ensued:

This was before the committee which was going to award the contract.

Mr. WHITE. And we ourselves can see that that is all right and desirable, but we know that it is being charged in Congress and elsewhere that the contract, advertisement and contract, permits of no competition, while the law does contemplate competition.

Mr. JOS. T. LYKES. Yes; that is quite true; it will substantially or practically, I will say, limit competition as far as we can see, and very frankly, that is one reason why we want it in one contract, which is, as we say, in accordance, as far as we understand it, with the general intention of all branches of the Government, that the contract should go to these Government services.

In other words, at the very time the matter was being taken up before the interdepartmental committee, under a law which said that there must be competitive bidding, the Government's agent, who has since been removed from the service, and Mr. Lykes, the beneficiary, one of those whose investment jumped from $115,000 to $6,000,000 out of Government gratuities, say, "Why, of course, frankly, that is the reason why we want it drawn in that way, so that there will be no competition."

Mr. LONG. That is fraud under the law.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, it is. Where the law says there shall be competition, and an agreement is made between the person who is to get something and the agent of the person who is to get it to evade the requirement as to competition, how anybody can deny that such an agreement is fraudulent is more than I can conceive.

Mr. LONG. The court says it is void ab initio.

Mr. BLACK. It is void from the beginning. It was void then. It was a fraud against every man, woman, and child in this country; and it is a fraud against them now.

Those votes on this joint resolution are either going to vote to repudiate and denounce fraud or they are going to vote to the contrary. The question is going to be raised so that no one need say that it is not presented for his consideration.

I am simply proposing an amendment to the joint resolution which says to Congress, "You appointed a committee which held hearings for practically a year. That committee came back here and reported to you that these contracts were fraudulent and bad; that the Government had been defrauded. You then referred the matter to the Postmaster General. After a full and complete hearing, with both sides represented by counsel, with evidence presented under oath, your Postmaster General has filed in your body a report which says that each and every single contract was entered into contrary to law, and may be canceled."

It so happens that one of these contracts was made with an agency which is in my State. It is my belief, from the evidence I have seen, that there was perhaps less of reprehensible conduct with reference to that particular contract than any other contract which is in existence; but the report shows, the recommendation is made, that all of them were made contrary to law, and my amendment to the joint resolution draws no distinction between the company which operates in the State from which I come and the company which operates in any other State. The time has come when, if we are going to build up a merchant marine, we must start to do it on a firm, sound, honest foundation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. To argue that merchant-marine activities have to be maintained by crookedness and rottenness, and that we cannot have them in any other way, is just the same as to argue that we are not for the Treasury unless we are willing to have some thief go in there and get ten or fifteen million dollars of its money.

This thing is admittedly fraudulent. It is not only the testimony of the Senator from Alabama, but their own written agreements with one another that the committee had—I saw some of them—go to the extent of saying that they took the most devious courses to see that there was no competition, and the profits they made are the most gigantic and astounding things that were ever heard of. The Senator just read one as to the $100,000. They did not even put up the $100,000. They did not stand a chance to lose $100,000; but under the fiction of $100,000, they got $6,000,000 of Government money. The Roosevelt Steamship Corporation did the same thing. They went into a conspiracy during the Republican administration, and undertook to perfect it and carry it on under the Democratic administration, and I happen to know that they thought they had this very Black committee stopped on this thing a year ago. They thought they had this thing hushed up and that it would not come to light.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, here is what happened. Here is how $500 of the Government money grew. Let me read it to you. This grew with reference to each contract that was made by the Government. The Government got the worst end of all of it.

Here is where they started in 1921 with $500—the Admiral Oriental Line. It is claimed that they actually paid in $500. I asked a witness on the stand under oath, and he said he was reasonably sure that they actually paid in the $500.

Mr. LONG. I doubt it.

Mr. BLACK. At the time they put in $500 they gave their notes for $499,500 so as to have a half-million-dollar corporation. Then they got a contract with the Government and began operating a line on November 2, 1922. They operated under this and succeeding manager-operator agreements for 3 years and 5 months. During this period the private company realized net profits from its operation of $533,713.96—a reasonably good profit. They also earned profits in the amount of $463,682 from operations largely made possible by the existence of this contract.

During this period the notes given for capital stock were wholly retired by dividends from earnings. Subsequently, without investing a dollar in addition to the original $500, this company bought the line and certain ships from the Government, and has earned net profits of $4,106,590.46 from the operation of these vessels, including a mail-contract gratuity, making a total net operating profit on the $500 of $4,640,204.42.

Mr. LONG. That is on $500.

Mr. BLACK. This figure does not include $2,127,653.30 profits of the $500 company from other sources.

Now let us see what happened in this case. Let us take what this company did. Its representative is here now. He has been here for a week; that is, its special representative:

At June 30, 1934, the total amount owing to the Shipping Board was $16,684,479.79. Of this amount $1,119,701.79 was past due on construction loans and a total of $1,895,000 in ships sales notes had been extended. Nine hundred and forty-seven thousand five hundred of this latter amount have been reextended, thus avoiding defaults.

The evidence shows that one of the contributing causes of the company's delinquencies was excessive cash withdrawals, directly or indirectly, through their respective families or family corporations, by the four Dollar principals, Messrs. R. Stanley Dollar, J. Harold Dollar, H. M. Lorber, and Herbert Fleishhacker.

In this connection the contractor asserts that there is no relationship between the Dollar Steamship Line (contractor on routes 25 and 27) and the Admiral Oriental Line (contractor on route 26). It appears from the evidence that this position has been successfully maintained in regard to Government loans, and payments thereon. However, for the purpose of ascertaining the amounts of cash withdrawn by the principal joint officers, stockholders, and directors of these two companies the record properly consolidates the payments.

The evidence shows that in 1925, when Government aid on the Dollar routes was limited to fostering a monopoly of American-flag ships for this company as a result of low-priced ship sales, Messrs. R. Stanley Dollar, J. Harold Dollar, H. M. Lorber, and Herbert Fleishhacker withdrew, in cash, the total sum of $162,000. If this rate of withdrawal had been maintained during the first 5½ years of foreign ocean mail contract operations (Jan. 1, 1929, to June 30, 1934), the withdrawals would have totaled $891,000 instead of the $2,762,257.46 actually withdrawn, as shown by the evidence.

Messrs. R. Stanley Dollar, J. Harold Dollar, H. M. Lorber, and Herbert Fleishhacker!

So, Mr. President, we have here this question. It has been impossible to legislate up to date. That is strange, is it not? We have had this question before us ever since this Congress began, but there has been no legislation.

This afternoon we were told before the committee by Mr. Ira Campbell, the attorney for the Ship Operators' Association, that they were against the bill, which had been sent up here and had been agreed upon between the Commerce Department and the Post Office Department, while they were working on it at the instance of the President. We were told by Mr. Patchin that he was against it. He is with the Grace Co., and he said that he called up Mr. Dalton Mann in California this week and talked to him at great length over long-distance telephone, to tell him about this bill, and he stated that they preferred no legislation at all rather than to have this measure, which is drawn in the public interest, and while it would promote a merchant marine, if that can be done by subsidy, and would protect the people's interest, he said that he reached the conclusion that it would be better to have a simple resolution passed by the Senate and the House which would extend the date for the President to cancel the contracts until next April, and he talked to his superior in California about it.

Now we have a resolution which is exactly what they want. The same operators who, according to the report of the Postmaster General, have contracts which were made in violation of law, and which ought to be canceled, came here from the North, the South, the East, and the West, and when placed under oath they said: "Yes; we do not want that law. The only thing to do, therefore, is to get a resolution, a simple resolution, which will maintain the status quo so that we may keep on drawing the money which we have been drawing under these contracts."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. It is also true that the President of the United States wants the extension.

Mr. BLACK. The President of the United States may want the extension, but if he does, I am fooled, and if he does, I am further of the opinion that he has not been fully informed of the facts in connection with it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is stating that the President is not fully informed of the facts. I understood the Senator just now to say that he had informed the President.

Mr. BLACK. I said that I did not believe that the President had approved this particular joint resolution, and that if he had done so, in my judgment, he had not been informed of the facts, and, in my judgment, he could not have been, because the facts which I have just mentioned were brought out on the stand less than 2 hours ago.

Mr. BAILEY. I would not say that he knows things which happened 2 hours ago, but here is a statement before the Senate by the Chairman of the Committee on Commerce that the President desires the joint resolution to be passed as approved by the Committee on Commerce, and presented to the Senate by the chairman of the committee. It strikes me that in order for the Senator who has the floor to sustain his cause, he must convince the Senate that we will here give a vote of no confidence in the President, and take from him a power which we gave him, and take it away from him on the ground that, in the light of the facts known to himself, he has refused to act.

I am unwilling to slap the President in the face, and I am amazed that the Senator from Alabama, having reflected on the committee, and having said to all Senators here, "If you do not vote for my resolution you are condoning fraud", goes further and says that the President himself ought to be deprived of the power we gave him because he has failed to exercise it, notwithstanding the fact that he knew the facts. That is the Senator's position.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, that is the interpretation the Senator from North Carolina places upon my position. I am perfectly willing to let the record of our respective votes, our position on economic matters, our record with reference to progressive legislation which the President favors, show which one of us would most likely be with the President. But, Mr. President, I desire to state that even if the President were to tell me in person that he favored this joint resolution, which I do not believe he would do, in view of the facts which have been developed, I would still stand on the Senate floor and state that here and now the Senate ought to vote to cancel these contracts because they were conceived in fraud and iniquity, administered in the same way, and the report has been made by the Postmaster General of the United States.

Mr. President, I decline to be placed in the position that I am making any charge against the President, because that is not true. I have not done so. I have stood to support him.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I wish to disabuse the Senator's mind of any suspicion that I have accused him of making any charge against the President. I have said that the effect of his argument and of the amendment to the joint resolution is to ask the Senate to withdraw from the President a power which the Congress gave him, and to do it in order that the Congress may take an action which the President has not taken, and that the whole basis of the argument is that various frauds have been committed, that the President has not acted properly in the circumstances, and, therefore, that Congress must act. If that is a misunderstanding of the Senator's argument, I leave it to the Senate. We have all heard the Senator.

Mr. BLACK. It is a thorough and complete misunderstanding, as I shall now attempt to show the Senator again.

I did not state, nor did I infer, that the President's failure to act up to date, even with knowledge of the facts of fraud, was anything for which he could be criticized. On the contrary, I stated that on account of the fact that a cancelation of the contracts would bring about a chaotic condition if done without notice and without preparation, and without a new law to take the place of the old, it would probably be a very improvident action.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, that is a proper statement of what the Senator said in reply to the senior Senator from Maryland, but that is not the point. His proposition is to take from the President a power which the President has had until now, and now has, and has not used, and return that power to ourselves and exercise it, on the ground that the long existence of well-known frauds, exposed by the Senator and his committee in its report, has not been responded to by the exercise of the President's power.

If I give a man a power to use and take it back from him on the ground that he has failed to use it by way of repudiating a fraud, what can be the effect of my action except to say, "You were not worthy of the power I gave you. I will no longer trust you with it. I will take it back and exercise it myself."

I am not saying that the Senator has thought that, but I am saying that that is the effect of his resolution and of his demand upon the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, with all the ingenuity of my good friend the able Senator from North Carolina, he has not been able to draw the distinction which he desires, because he assumes that what I am doing is an attempt to withdraw the power because it has not been exercised. That is not correct.

I stated that under the conditions it was impossible for it to be exercised without bringing about a condition which should not be brought about. Following that we find ourselves in a situation where the President himself has recommended that legislation be passed, and the bill which came to this body after a conference between the Commerce Department and the Post Office Department, at the request of the President, contains a provision for cancelation, the exact provision which I have offered now.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will not yield until I have concluded what I have to say, because I have not finished answering the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I take great delight in the prospect that the Senator shall some day finish. I will do all I can to aid him.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator can do that by sitting down and letting me finish.

Mr. BAILEY. I may.

Mr. BLACK. Or the Senator might stand up and let me finish.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, having come thus far, we find a situation where the President has recommended a law but the Congress has not acted. If this law had been enacted, it would not have been necessary to pass the joint resolution or the amendment to it. But it is my belief that one of the reasons a law has not been passed is because the shipping operators believe—in fact, they know—that if they can get through a simple resolution they may continue to draw these funds which ought to be cut off at the earliest possible moment. In addition to that——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BLACK. I yield again.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish here to repudiate and thoroughly to resent the imputation that the joint resolution presented by the chairman of our committee and approved by the committee is a measure that some outside force was undertaking to get through. That is a reflection upon 18 members of that committee. I am going to request the chairman of the committee to respond to that. But I do not think that the Senator from Alabama means to reflect upon the committee. If he does, I should like him to do so in perfectly direct terms and let us know what to expect and how to respond.

Mr. BLACK. I have no objection to saying anything I say in direct terms so that the Senator from North Carolina or any other Senator may know exactly how and when to respond.

Mr. BAILEY. Proceed.

Mr. BLACK. I have tried to proceed. I stated that there was evidence presented before the committee less than 2 hours ago by a witness under oath, a representative of the great steamship lines, that they had looked over the bill which was presented as drawn by the Commerce Department and the Post Office Department, and rather than have that bill passed he reached the conclusion that he would prefer a resolution which simply extended the status quo. I did not make the statement that he drew any such resolution. I said that if this resolution was passed it would comply exactly to that which he and those who are opposing legislation which will protect the public desire.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, Mr. President, I understand that the Senator does not impute anything to the committee by reason of what he heard in this man's testimony.

Mr. BLACK. As I said, if I had anything to impute to the committee I would do it directly and in plain, unequivocal language so that he who runs can read.

Mr. BAILEY. And he who reads can run.

Mr. BLACK. He might.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. I have listened with a great deal of interest, and certainly with an equal amount of patience, and I just want to be sure that I really understand what the Senator has been telling us at length. As I understand the situation, under the present law the President of the United States, after a certain time, could, if he felt any fraud existed, cancel any or all contracts. That is, he has the authority now to cancel any of these contracts in question if he feels there has been any fraud.

Mr. BLACK. Up to October 31.

Mr. BARBOUR. Now, as I understand the Senator from Alabama, he simply seeks by a single act of Congress to cancel all these contracts after a certain date, whether or not any of them are fraudulent.

Mr. BLACK. No; not whether any are fraudulent or others are not fraudulent. I do it on the ground that the report has been made that all of them are fraudulent.

Mr. BARBOUR. Then willy-nilly, by a fiat of legislation, it is the wish of the Senator from Alabama thus out of hand to cancel all these contracts on a certain date?

Mr. BLACK. I do not know about the "willy-nilly" or "fiat", but I do know that it is my opinion that when a governmental agency such as the Post Office Department and the committee of the Senate report that they are fraudulent it seems to me that honesty and decency require that they be canceled at the earliest possible moment, because I believe in punishment for fraud. I am opposed to fraud.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, obviously, we are all opposed to fraud. That, of course, is not the question at all.

Mr. BLACK. I am opposed to fraud. I assume it may be a strange position to take.

Mr. BARBOUR. No; it is not. We all, of course, take the same position.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me once more?

Mr. BLACK. When I have finished answering what the Senator from New Jersey has asked.

Mr. BARBOUR. I now understand the situation, Mr. President. But there is a difference of opinion as to what constitutes fraud and what is not fraud. Whether or not on the basis of fact—not merely opinion—there is or is not fraud.

Mr. BLACK. That may be true. I always thought fraud consisted in taking advantage of somebody by surreptitious means or conspiracy to defraud or something of that kind.

Mr. BARBOUR. The fact remains that the Senator from Alabama feels that all these contracts—and there must be hundreds of them—all over the United States, in respect to probably every port in the United States, involving countless shipping companies and countless citizens—all these contracts are frauds and obtained by fraud. I most certainly cannot agree with the Senator.

Mr. BLACK. And having heard these facts myself, and having also read the Postmaster General's report, after both sides were presented, and represented by counsel, and long and extended hearings, I cannot feel that tender and gentle solicitude for people who I believe have been robbing the Treasury of the United States unfairly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply wish to remark to the Senator by way of an interrogatory: If honesty and decency require the cancelation of these contracts, as the Senator has just said, why may we not trust that cancelation to the great President of the United States? Not one here will say that he would not respond to considerations of honesty and decency.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the Senator, and I believe he will.

Mr. BAILEY. Then our resolution simply extends the time of his power.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; and places him still in the same position if a law is not passed by next April; while the resolution now offered gives to that same great President whom the Senator mentions and whom I believe will cancel these contracts, because I trust his honesty and his integrity—gives to him an added weapon to obtain a law. He will have not only the desire on the part of myself and the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from New York and others to get a law but will have back of it then the interests which have been opposing the passage of a law.

Mr. BAILEY. But, Mr. President, the Senator will not deny that his proposal cancels the contracts by the act of Congress, and therefore no longer puts them up to the President's sense of honesty and decency.

Mr. BLACK. I deny that emphatically.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not stating it as the Senator's view. I am stating it as the clear implication of his argument. I do not think that he believes that, but that is what his argument says to me, and I, of course, leave the judgment to the other Senators.

Mr. BLACK. I am sorry I cannot make the Senator see it. I presume it is my inability to express myself clearly, because I know the Senator's keen and logical mind, and I therefore attribute all that to myself. However, knowing what I do about it, I know he is wrong. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAILEY. I am very grateful for the Senator's kindly suggestion. I know that all my shortcomings and those of everyone else may be attributed to him because he has such a great excess of virtue that he could spare a little for the others of us.

Mr. BLACK. I am sorry the Senator does not need any of it. He has a halo, a glorious halo, around his head. It has been there for many years. Far be it from me to attempt to snatch one star from that diadem of holy and honest virtue. Therefore, I return his compliment, and that being concluded I shall now return to the discussion of the issues before the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The reports referred to by the Senator from the Post Office Department were turned over to the President, were they not?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; they were.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator received them from the President with a letter?

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. So the President has the information?

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. May I say that I too have been chairman of an investigating committee this year when Mr. Mitchell made certain charges against the Department of Commerce. I learned then that a committee consisting of representatives from the legal division and from the Comptroller's division of the Commerce Department "combed all the testimony adduced before the Black committee and made reports from time to time. As well as I recall at this time there has only been one case where that committee has located any fraud."

Mr. BLACK. Who said that?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. Trimble. I respect the Senator as an honest, conscientious man, but it may well be that the conclusions he has reached are not the conclusions which other men might reach. It is very apparent to me that if the President of the United States had believed these contracts were fraudulent he would have canceled them, and that to my mind is self-evident. I cannot agree with the position taken by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, the fact that the contracts have not been canceled up to date, let me repeat, is not the slightest evidence of any kind or character that the President of the United States does not believe they should be canceled. It is an evidence of the fact that he desired to be cautious. He transmitted a message to the Congress asking for legislation. He has been urging legislation. The Senator from New York will recall that he and I and others were present at a conference with the President with the idea of seeing if some kind of legislation could not be enacted in order that the entire matter might be adjusted.

My proposal is not intended to indicate any distrust of the President. I do not believe it can be fairly construed as such, for the reason that, in my judgment, if the power should be given to the President, some kind of law could be enacted which would relieve us from a state of chaos and confusion. I am confident that he would follow the recommendations of his Postmaster General and cancel the contracts. But it is my belief that he would be better able to accomplish his purpose and secure a law if the Congress should here and now cancel the contracts effective as of a future date.

That is why I made the statement to the Senator from North Carolina, that I did not see how it could be said that my proposal indicated a distrust of the President. What I desire to do is to make it possible to secure action at the earliest possible moment, and at the same time remove any obstacle that may be standing in the way, in whole or in part, of the enactment of legislation. There is a great deal of difference between a situation where everybody wants legislation and a situation where some want legislation. It is my judgment that if these contracts could be canceled effective as of April 1, not only would those who are honestly interested in a merchant marine from a wholly disinterested standpoint, and not from the standpoint of financial benefit, desire to have a law enacted, but also those who have contracts with the Government would be anxious to secure the enactment of legislation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is not the resolution of the Senator from Alabama actually calculated very greatly to facilitate the enactment into law of the principles set out in the President's message by setting a deadline before which some action must be taken or the contracts be canceled, as against the proposition of leaving the situation in status quo as it is now, so that the President would be faced with the dilemma either of canceling these vicious contracts and leaving the ocean-mail situation without any provision, or else continuing in effect these vicious contracts in toto.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct. It seems to me to be decidedly unfair to place the President up against a situation probably next April if no law shall have been enacted, when he must absolutely decide right then and there, without any law by which his feet may be guided, upon the cancelation of these contracts. I do not believe it to be fair or just to the President of the United States.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I have not been privileged to hear all of the Senator's argument. I should like to ask what would be the effect of the contracts if they are not automatically canceled by new legislation of the character the Senator now describes? What would be their status after April 1, and would they assume a permanent status if they were not canceled by law?

Mr. BLACK. In my judgment it is the duty of the Comptroller General now to discontinue payments on the contracts. That is one of the reasons why I was willing to forego many views I have with reference to the kind of legislation that should be enacted in an effort to aid in the passage of legislation. I am very anxious that legislation shall be enacted.

The bill which was presented to the Chairman of the Commerce Committee of the Senate as the composite viewpoint of the Post Office Department and the Commerce Department did not represent the views I held. It was in my judgment the best substitute bill that has yet been submitted. I was then and I am now willing to forego my own views on the subject of operating the merchant marine in order to secure the passage of such a bill to protect the interests of the public.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I may say that the bill referred to by the Senator was presented to the Commerce Committee of the Senate and unanimously rejected. We sent word to the President about it and he sent word back that though he did not have time to go into the matter thoroughly, it seemed to be all right and if the committee approved of it, why not pass it?

Mr. BLACK. The President did not read the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. The President has not endorsed the bill presented here by Mr. West, and the Commerce Committee did not do so.

Mr. BLACK. But the Senator does know that the President had the bill delivered to Mr. West.

Mr. COPELAND. No; I do not know.

Mr. BLACK. And that Mr. West held it until he could find out what was to be done, and that that bill was drawn by these two departments together, at the request of the President.

Mr. COPELAND. I was also told by the Commerce Department that so far as it was concerned, it was a forced agreement.

Mr. BLACK. It may be that the Commerce Department made a forced agreement. If so, I regret very much to hear it, and I should like to know which member of the Commerce Department objected to the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I will discuss the matter.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I have finished my remarks. I am of the opinion that the best interests of the country, the best interests of the people, the best interests of the President, and the best interests of the merchant marine, require and demand that the substitute be adopted, instead of the original joint resolution; and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Logan	Reynolds
Ashurst	Costigan	Lonergan	Robinson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Alabama to the joint resolution.

UNITED STATES TEXAS CENTENNIAL COMMISSION

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I introduce and ask unanimous consent to take up for passage a joint resolution exempting the employees of the Texas Centennial Commission from the civil service. There are only a few of them, and it will save a great deal of expense. The jobs are temporary.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Let us have the joint resolution read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 178) to authorize the appointment of certain officers and employees of the United States Texas Centennial Commission, without regard to the civil-service laws, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Commissioner General of the United States Texas Centennial Commission is authorized to appoint such officers and employees as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of Public Resolution No. 37, Seventy-fourth Congress, without regard to the civil-service laws, and to fix their salaries (except the salaries of the assistant commissioners provided for in section 3 of such public resolution) in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INCOME AND INHERITANCE TAXATION

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the views of the dissenting members of the conference committee on House bill 8974.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

JOINT STATEMENT BY DISSENTING MEMBERS OF THE CONFERENCE COMMITTEE CONSIDERING H. R. 8974

We have not signed the conference report on the tax bill because we do not wish in any way to be a party to the final enactment of this legislative absurdity.

It is not a revenue bill, and as everybody knows it was never intended to be. The only reason it is before Congress is because the President asked for it, and the only reason it will be passed is because the President wants it passed.

No one can justify the bill. It is significant that neither the House Ways and Means Committee nor the Senate Finance Committee even attempted to do so in their respective reports on the bill. Their silence in this respect is eloquent testimony of the absence of any valid excuse for its enactment.

It has not been possible for the conferees to work out a good bill from either the House or Senate provisions. Their whole effort has been confined to salvaging as many of the President's original suggestions as possible, irrespective of merit, and at the same time they have kept in mind the fact that they must provide at least $250,000,000 of revenue in order to keep the bill from being made any more ridiculous as a tax measure. Under the circumstances it is no wonder that the compromise agreement is unscientific and unsound.

The revenue to be raised would pay the current running expenses of the Government for approximately 11 days, and it is but one-fifteenth of the amount of the deficit for the last fiscal year. Hence it is an absolute joke as a revenue measure.

If it is necessary to come $250,000,000 closer to balancing the Budget, the amount could very readily be realized, without the necessity of imposing further burdensome taxation, by the simple expedient of eliminating some of the unnecessary, wasteful, and extravagant expenditures now being made by the administration.

Perhaps the most objectionable feature of the compromise bill is that providing for a graduated income tax on corporations ranging from 12½ percent to 15 percent, in lieu of the present flat rate of 13¾ percent. This provision is in the bill merely to satisfy a whim of the President. It is unfair and unjust, and violates the principle of ability to pay. Corporations are merely aggregations of individuals, and under the graduated tax the numerous small taxpayers of a large corporation (for example, the 700,000 stockholders in the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.) would have to bear a greater burden than the very wealthy stockholders of smaller corporations. Aside from this fact, any increase in corporation taxes at this time will only add further impediments in the way of business recovery.

Senator JESSE H. METCALF.
Representative ALLEN T. TREADWAY.
Representative ISAAC BACHARACH.

ORDER FOR RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its labors today, it take a recess until 10 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PERMISSION TO CONFERENCE COMMITTEES TO REPORT

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the recess of the Senate conference committees may be permitted to submit their reports to the Secretary of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULES

Mr. KING submitted the following notice of motion to suspend the rules:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 9215) making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, etc., the following amendment, viz: At the proper place insert the following:

"The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby directed to make loans to domestic producers of wool at the rate of 30 cents per pound, secured by wool stored in warehouses or other places to be approved by said Corporation upon such terms and conditions as shall fully protect the interests of said Corporation and the United States."

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND THE RULES

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted the following notice of motion to suspend the rules:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI, for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 9215) making appropriations to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, the following amendment, viz, at the proper place to insert the following:

"That so much of the last sentence of section 32 of the act entitled 'An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes' (H. R. 8492, 74th Cong.) as precedes the second proviso is amended to read as follows: 'The amounts appropriated under this section shall be expended for such of the above-specified purposes, and at such times, in such manner, and in such amounts as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe.'"

WALTER F. NORTHROP

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 531, granting compensation to Walter F. Northrop. The bill has passed the House with an amendment reducing the amount from $10,000 to $2,500. I ask unanimous consent to substitute the House bill for my bill, Senate bill 154.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 531) granting compensation to Walter F. Northrop.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator briefly explain, in a word or two, just what the measure is for?

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, it is quite a long story; but this bill has been passed by the House several times, and I assure the Senator that it is a meritorious case. The full record is in the report which has been submitted heretofore. The amount has been reduced in the House bill from $10,000, which I think was excessive, to $2,500, which completes the matter; and I hope the Senator will withhold any objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KING. Is the bill for compensation for alleged injury?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; it is.

Mr. KING. Growing out of what?

Mr. BARBOUR. Growing out of the fact that the claimant was shot by a soldier at Edgewater, N. J.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500 to Walter F. Northrop, of Tenafly, N. J., in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for injuries sustained by the said Walter F. Northrop when shot by a soldier at Edgewater, N. J., November 15, 1919: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

OFFICIAL OR UNOFFICIAL SENATE REPRESENTATIVES ABROAD

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, which I ask to have read, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 198) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate hereby gives notice that none of its Members has been authorized either directly or indirectly to act as the official or unofficial representative abroad of the Senate or any of its committees.

MENOMINEE TRIBE OF INDIANS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3210) to refer the claim of the Menominee Tribe of Indians to the Court of Claims with the absolute right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, which were, on page 5, line 3, after the word "or" to strike out the word "trial" and insert the word "trials"; on page 8, line 5, to strike out the words "per annum" and insert in lieu thereof the words "for the particular year or years in which maladministration is found"; and on the same page, line 10, after the word "Tribe" to strike out "for each year in which maladministration is found."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the amendments adopted by the House to this Senate bill are minor in character. I therefore move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

THE WHISPERING CAMPAIGN

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, a great deal has recently been said concerning the whispering campaign conducted against the President of the United States. During the hearings by the Special Committee to Investigate Lobbying Activities it developed that this plan was conceived by a stockholder of the utility interests. In order that the record may be kept straight and the facts relating to the manner in which this despicable plan was adopted the following is submitted.

On March 28, 1935, Mr. E. P. Cramer, the owner of some utility stock in the Electric Bond & Share Co., a member of the American Federation of Utility Investors, and then engaged in the advertising business, wrote a letter to Mr. C. E. Groesbeck, chairman of such Electric Bond & Share Co., in which, among other things, he said and offered the following suggestions, which suggestions, as will more fully appear, were carried out and adopted:

DEAR MR. GROESBECK: As a stockholder in Electric Bond & Share Co. I should like to suggest that our officers and directors take the leadership in assisting our stockholders to organize for the purpose of enrolling a substantial majority not only of the utility security owners but also of the owners of railroad and industrial securities into an association—not only for effective protection against political attack but also for destruction of the new deal, which is the motivating force behind the attack—not only for opposing and destroying the new deal but also for presenting a constructive national program to take its place.

You have more than once suggested that stockholders join the American Federation of Utility Investors. The other day I read an item saying that 1,200 utility stockholders held a mass meeting in Oil City, Pa., protesting the Rayburn bill and organizing the Security Holders Protective Association. I have seen numerous suggestions for such organization, and I believe other protective associations have been formed. * * *

Among the things I conceive it possible for such an organization to accomplish are: * * *.

3. A whispering campaign designed to create popular suspicion that the "new dealers", and especially the "New Dealer in Chief" are either incompetent or insane, discrediting them in the same way that Michaelson so successfully discredited Hoover. * * *

6. Support, in 1936 political campaign, of Presidential and congressional candidates, regardless of party, who pledge themselves to support the program of the security owners' organization. * * *

In suggesting that our officers and directors act to start the ball rolling I am not unmindful of the fact that the company, as a company, dare not be identified with the activity. Ways to meet this requirement will readily suggest themselves to you.

On August 1, 1935, Mr. E. P. Cramer appeared before the committee and I copy below some excerpts from his testimony which will clearly indicate how and where the whispering campaign against the President originated.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you connected with any association of stockholders or other people?

Mr. CRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the name of the association?

Mr. CRAMER. American Federation of Utility Investors.

The CHAIRMAN. Did anyone suggest to you in writing that you join that association?

Mr. CRAMER. I believe that the Electric Bond & Share Co., in which I am a stockholder, made that suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Electric Bond & Share Co.?

Mr. CRAMER. Some 2 years ago a printed slip, I believe, was enclosed with the report to the stockholders suggesting that they believed this organization was a desirable one to protect the interests of the stockholders. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. You have been to the office of the Electric Bond & Share Co. in New York, have you not?

Mr. CRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When was the last time you were there?

Mr. CRAMER. I suppose a month or 6 weeks ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom did you see while you were there?

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Walker, assistant to Mr. Groesbeck.

The CHAIRMAN. How long had you known Mr. Walker?

Mr. CRAMER. I did not know him before that moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that the only time you ever met him?

Mr. CRAMER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you discuss with him at that time a plan with reference to defeating or attempting to defeat the Wheeler-Rayburn bill?

Mr. CRAMER. Not precisely.

The CHAIRMAN. What was your discussion?

Mr. CRAMER. It was pertaining to ways and means of not merely fighting the Wheeler-Rayburn bill but also fighting the competition by the Government with certain subsidiary properties of the company.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the T. V. A.?

Mr. CRAMER. Yes. And others in prospect.

The CHAIRMAN. What others now in prospect?

Mr. CRAMER. There are other water-power projects which will eventually be developed. Some of the utilities out West, I understand, are at the moment receiving quite a large increase in business in power, which power is being used to construct hydroelectric developments which will later compete with them.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not simply confine the discussion to power with Mr. Walker, did you?

Mr. CRAMER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You discussed in general the opposition to all of the so-called "new deal" program?

Mr. CRAMER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And you went into details with him and he went into details with you as to the best method of defeating the entire program, did you not?

Mr. CRAMER. Well, in general; but more precisely those phases of it which we considered to be inimical to our interests. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. And he approved the plan which you had in general, did he not?

Mr. CRAMER. Well, he thought it was a good idea if it could be put into effect. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see about some other things. Here is another suggestion:

Engage an outstanding national figure such as Nicholas Murray Butler, Edwin S. Kemmerer, James M. Beck, or Newton D. Baker.

You suggested that, did you not?

Mr CRAMER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, you know that has been done, do you not, that both Mr. Beck and Mr. Baker have been employed?

Mr. CRAMER They have been employed by the Edison Electric Institute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Commonwealth & Southern and the Electric Bond & Share Co. contribute to the Edison Electric Institute, do they not?

Mr. CRAMER. I suppose they did.

The CHAIRMAN. And Mr. Groesbeck is one of the trustees, is he not?

Mr. CRAMER. I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew that they employed him and paid him $35,000, did you not?

Mr. CRAMER. I knew that they had employed him.

The CHAIRMAN. And you suggested that away back in March, did you not?

Mr. CRAMER. Well, not exactly. I merely mentioned it as examples of men of the caliber who, I believe, could be depended upon to give wise counsel and sound leadership. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. Do you remember reading the article by Mr. Paul Mallon about the whispering campaign against the President?

Mr. CRAMER. I don't know that I do off-hand.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not remember several weeks ago when there appeared an article on the front page of practically all the papers of this country stating that the President in an interview had been asked if his health was good and if he was all right?

Mr. CRAMER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You remember that, do you not?

Mr. CRAMER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And do you remember reading in the paper that that was done because there was a whispering campaign all over the Nation against the President? You read that, did you not?

Mr. CRAMER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You knew about that whispering campaign months before, did you not?

Mr. CRAMER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You were the man that suggested that whispering campaign be started attacking the President, are you not?

Mr. CRAMER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you deny that?

Mr. CRAMER. Sure.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you deny that you suggested that a whispering campaign be started by the power companies to try to convince the people of the United States that the President was insane? Do you deny that?

Mr. CRAMER. I deny that in the way that you mention it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you not suggest the words "whispering campaign" in quotations?

Mr. CRAMER. I included that as among the various subjects worthy of discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you not include the idea back in March that a whispering campaign be started against the President of the United States to try to convince the people of this Nation that he was insane?

Mr. CRAMER. I don't recall that.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you not also suggest that they try to convince the people that the so-called "brain trusters" were insane and that there should be a congressional investigation?

Mr. CRAMER. I recall suggesting the congressional investigation.

The CHAIRMAN. And did you not go and discuss these suggestions and plans in the head offices of the Electric Bond & Share Co. in the city of New York with Mr. Groesbeck's assistant?

Mr. CRAMER. Well, not in that detail.

The CHAIRMAN. You set it out in detail in your letter, did you not?

Mr. CRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you suggested that this whispering campaign be started, did you not?

Mr. CRAMER. I suggested that that was one of the subjects that might be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. And you know that it has been done, do you not?

Mr. CRAMER. I know that such a campaign has appeared.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, may I ask you if you did not use this language? Here is one of the suggestions:

A congressional investigation of the "brain trust" legislative "factory" designed to expose it to public resentment.

Mr. CRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You suggested that, did you not?

Mr. CRAMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Next:

"A whispering campaign designed to create popular suspicion that the 'new dealers' and especially the 'New Dealer in Chief' are either incompetent or insane, discrediting them in the same way that Michaelson so successfully discredited Hoover."

Did you not suggest that?

Mr. CRAMER. I suggested that as one of the things to be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. And you know as a matter of fact that, following that suggestion, there was a whispering campaign started to try to convince the people of this country that the President was both physically and mentally weak, do you not?

Mr. CRAMER. I know that such a campaign appeared; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And you know that you discussed it with people yourself, did you not?

Mr. CRAMER. Not specifically. Merely as part of that letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you deny that you discussed with people in Plainfield, N. J., and raised the question there as to the President and his physical and mental condition?

Mr. CRAMER. Yes. I did not do that——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Why did you suggest that it be done?

Mr. CRAMER. I merely suggested that that was one of the things to be considered. It was done in the previous administration.

The CHAIRMAN. And then after you suggested it and sent this letter to the chairman of the board of the Electric Bond & Share Co., suggesting this whispering campaign to try to convince the people of this Nation that their President was crazy, they asked you to come and see them, did they not?

Mr. CRAMER. No; I do not believe they did. I think that I went in to see them.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you not get a letter from them?

Mr. CRAMER. Yes; I got a letter acknowledging my letter, but not suggesting that I come to see them.

The CHAIRMAN. What did they tell you?

Mr. CRAMER. They said that they would write me about it a little bit later. A few days later I happened to be in New York and went up to their office. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. You read in Time about this whispering campaign that they had started against the President, did you not?

Mr. CRAMER. Yes, sir; I think I did.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see what this whispering campaign seems to have been, according to them. You read this:

"For a fortnight Washington correspondents have been plagued by queries from editors and publishers back home. All queries began alike: 'Is the story true that * * * ?' The stories also had one central theme: Franklin Roosevelt was on the verge of a collapse, physical, mental, or both. He had, according to the tales roaring through the country in whispers, grown mentally irresponsible."

That was exactly the kind of campaign that you suggested, was it not? Look at this and see if it was not.

Mr. CRAMER. Yes; that is one of the things.

The CHAIRMAN. That is one of the things you suggested. And that is one of the things you suggested to Mr. Walker or Mr. Groesbeck in the letter?

Mr. CRAMER. Well, it is just one of many things.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand it is one of many things. You noticed that shortly after you made that suggestion, you began to hear about this, did you not?

Mr. CRAMER. I don't think it was very shortly.

The CHAIRMAN. It was not long, was it?

Mr. CRAMER. It seems to me it was just recently.

The CHAIRMAN. It was not long, was it, after you went up to see Mr. Walker?

Mr. CRAMER. No; I don't think it was.

The CHAIRMAN. And it was certainly before July 22. Had you seen the President of the United States?

Mr. CRAMER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. How long since you saw him?

Mr. CRAMER. I don't know that I ever did.

The CHAIRMAN. You have never seen him? Had you seen anybody that had seen the President of the United States when you suggested a whispering campaign?

Mr. CRAMER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. To try to condemn him as an insane man?

Mr. CRAMER. Not that I know of.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not think any such thing was true, did you, and if so, on what basis?

Mr. CRAMER. Well, I think that there is something wrong somewhere. I don't know what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. On what basis?

Mr. CRAMER. There is so much confusion.

The CHAIRMAN. So much confusion. Do you claim——

Mr. CRAMER (interrupting). Cross-purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you claim that you had any basis on earth to try to circulate a report to the people of the United States that their President was insane, and if so give it now?

Mr. CRAMER. No; none whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. None whatever. You knew it was false, did you not? So far as you knew, it was false, was it not?

Mr. CRAMER. [No answer.]

The CHAIRMAN. That is true, is it not?

Mr. CRAMER. Well, I don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. Had you heard any doctor make any such statement?

Mr. CRAMER. No; certainly not.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, you intended it to be just what it is here, a pure fabrication, did you not?

Mr. CRAMER. I intended it to be analogous to the campaign against Mr. Hoover.

The CHAIRMAN. I see. Now, will you read this, please? You intended it to be a pure fabrication, did you not, Mr. Cramer, because you had no evidence on earth to support any such statement, did you?

Mr. CRAMER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. And you did not know of any, did you?

Mr. CRAMER. No. I would like to read you, if I may, the last paragraph or two of this letter. May I do that?

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Read that too.

Mr. CRAMER (reading):

"The foregoing is not intended as a finished, perfected plan but as something definite to serve as a basis for discussion out of which a successful plan may be evolved."

Now, then, in connection with that subject which you have been——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Read the last paragraph now.

Mr. CRAMER (reading):

"In suggesting that our officers and directors act to start the ball rolling, I am not unmindful of the fact that the company, as a company, dare not be identified with the activity. Ways to meet this requirement will readily suggest themselves to you."

The CHAIRMAN. Now, may I show you a letter that came to me on May 22 from Alabama along with others of a similar kind? The Alabama Power Co. is located in Alabama, and that is a subsidiary of the Commonwealth & Southern. Will you read that first paragraph, please, into the record? [Handing paper to witness.]

Mr. CRAMER (examining paper). The first paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMER (reading):

"I have not written you before about the Wheeler-Rayburn bill because I did not think that any sane man would ever approve anything so drastic and destructive as this bill seems to be."

The CHAIRMAN. You read there the last paragraph in which you stated to them that the company could not afford to be in it. Why did you tell them that?

Mr. CRAMER. Because all utility companies, in my opinion, are unpopular with the public.

The CHAIRMAN. The object of it was that you knew that anybody that started a campaign against the President—of course, you did not anticipate anybody would ever find out that suggestion, did you? You did not think anybody would ever discover that when you wrote it?

Mr. CRAMER. No; I did not give that any consideration; no, sir. I might add, too, that I have been criticized for that, and I agree that the criticism was just. * * *

Senator SCHWELLENBACH. It was your idea when you made the suggestion of this campaign that only sound and constructive suggestions and methods should be used?

Mr. CRAMER. That is right.

Senator SCHWELLENBACH. And you considered that carrying on an unwarranted falsely malicious whispering campaign to convince the people of this country that their President was insane was a sound and constructive method?

Mr. CRAMER. No, sir; I do not. To elaborate on that, as I said before, these various suggestions were made purely for discussion.

Senator SCHWELLENBACH. Well, they worked out.

OCEAN MAIL CONTRACTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 175) to extend the time within which contracts may be modified or canceled under the provisions of section 5 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I shall not speak more than 3 or 4 minutes in reply to what the Senator from Alabama has said. He has spoken about a lobby, and I assume that the fact that he is investigating lobbies is the cause of his going into the matter of a possible ship lobby.

I have had made a list of persons who have come to me in connection with the ship-subsidy bill. I want it to be known by all men that my door is open to anyone who wants to come to me to give me what he regards as important information. I can trust myself; and, in the last analysis, I am going to decide for myself whether or not the alleged information brought in is good information and worth while.

I find that I have had visits from nearly 40 persons in regard to this matter. I find that of these 11 were representatives of persons holding mail contracts, 20 were those not interested in mail contracts, but interested in shipping, 6 of them were labor groups, to argue about the various seamen provisions of the joint resolution.

Mr. President, this is not the time or place to pay respects to the shipowners. I am just as critical of them as is the Senator from Alabama. They have an annual national convention here in Washington the last of December every year, and the theme of my remarks to them has always been embodied in this question addressed to them: "Why do you not agree on some general principle and attempt to operate your business on a standard which will make an appeal to all concerned, particularly to those who legislate?"

There are just as many opinions in the shipowners' industry as there are shipowners. A concerted lobby on their part is as impossible as it is to get the inmates of a lunatic asylum to agree together on anything. The reason why one guard in a lunatic asylum can take care of 20 inmates is because the 20 inmates never agree.

What I am saying is from the heart; it is disagreeable, perhaps, but the shipping industry of this country is largely responsible for its own sad condition, and it is a sad condition.

Mr. President, I want an American merchant marine, and so does the Senator from Alabama. We do not agree at all as to how such a merchant marine can be established. It is my honest conviction that the Jones-White Act, if it had been honestly and efficiently administered from the beginning, would have given us an efficient merchant marine.

I have no apology to offer for any shipowner or company which might have gone to those in authority in order to secure a contract which was not in the public interest. I am not interested in that; that is all water over the mill. The question now is, What shall we do to obtain an efficient American merchant marine?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Unfortunately, some of us have been absent from the Chamber, engaged in committee work. Will not the Senator very briefly and concisely state what the issue is between himself and the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. COPELAND. In the independent offices appropriation bill of 1934 a provision was inserted to this effect:

> The President is hereby, upon giving 60 days' notice and opportunity for public hearing to parties to such contracts, authorized, in his discretion, on or before April 30, 1935, to modify or cancel such contracts.

The President must determine whether or not it is in the public interest.

Mr. WALSH. Did the President act under that provision of law?

Mr. COPELAND. He did not.

Mr. WALSH. So he canceled no contracts?

Mr. COPELAND. The contracts have not been canceled.

Mr. WALSH. The contractors have proceeded as if the law had not been passed?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. What is the proposal now?

Mr. COPELAND. Just one step, and I will state the proposal.

On the 4th of March last the President sent a message to us asking for the passage of a ship-subsidy bill.

Mr. WALSH. I recall that.

Mr. COPELAND. That was on the 4th of March. I received almost immediately a letter from the Postmaster General saying that on the 30th of April this provision of law to which I have just referred would take effect, and these contracts would be canceled or modified unless they were in the public interest.

Mr. WALSH. Who gave that intimation to the Senator?

Mr. COPELAND. The Postmaster General. I went to the President and told him it would not be possible even to prepare a bill by the 30th of April, let alone pass one, and certainly the events of the last few weeks have vindicated the truth of what I said. We suggested the question about continuing this matter, advancing the date. The President asked me what I thought about the date, and I suggested a year's advance.

Mr. WALSH. One year?

Mr. COPELAND. One year. That was last April. He said, "Congress will be in session until August and you will have plenty of time to pass the bill. If you have not time, then it can be continued another 6 months."

The information I have from the President now is that he would like to have this done, and continue the contracts until the 30th of next April.

Mr. WALSH. And the Senator's proposal is to do that?

Mr. COPELAND. That is what my joint resolution provides. The Senator from Alabama proposes to continue the contracts in force until the last day of March next, and then that all of them shall be canceled.

Mr. WALSH. In other words, the proposal of the Senator from Alabama is to take away the discretionary power which the President will have under the Senator's joint resolution, to cancel the contracts if he sees fit to cancel them?

Mr. COPELAND. Not alone the discretionary power the President will have but that which he now has. He could have brought about cancelation at any time up to this date, and up to the 31st of October he can bring about cancelation and modification.

Mr. WALSH. What is the position of the Postmaster General? Is it the same as the President's?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not know what his position is, but officials of his Department would like to cancel the contracts tomorrow morning at sunrise, because these payments under the contracts are a charge against the Post Office Department, and an unfair charge. It means putting the Department in the red all the time, and, of course, it wants to get out. I do not blame it for that.

Mr. WALSH. I take it the Senator contends that he is advocating a course of action which the administration desires?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I do not accept the statement that the administration desires the joint resolution, unless the administration sends a message to the Senate to that effect.

Mr. COPELAND. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that it is my understanding that the President wants it.

Mr. WALSH. Has the Senator drawn that conclusion as the result of a conversation which he has had with the President?

Mr. COPELAND. From conversation I had with the President some months ago and information brought to me by the Secretary of Commerce this morning.

Mr. BLACK. Since that statement has been made based upon conversations, I want to state that I am compelled to stand by my statement that unless the President sent a message here personally, I would not accept that as his desire, although even if he sent such a message I would still believe that he should not have done so. I am not questioning the Senator's construction at all.

Mr. WALSH. But it is significant that the Senator from New York states that this morning the Secretary of Commerce indicated that this proposition was approved.

Mr. BLACK. I do not make any question as to the Secretary of Commerce. That is quite a different matter.

Mr. COPELAND. What I said was that the Secretary of Commerce said that the President believed that.

By the same token that the Senator from Alabama is not sure whether anybody can bring any message which is authentic, I want to say to the Senator from Alabama that there have been three bills handed to me—and one of them in the presence of the Senator from Alabama on Monday of this week—which were said to be administration bills, and when I investigated I did not find that to be the fact.

Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama talks about Mr. Ira Campbell. Mr. Ira Campbell was around my office all day yesterday, and I had a telegram from him this morning. Why did he want to see me? To have this resolution passed? No! He did not want passed the owners' liability bill, which was passed by the Senate last night, thank God—a limited liability measure designed to give protection to people at sea. He was here yesterday arguing with me by the hour against that bill, and I had a telegram this morning from him when he did not know that it had already been passed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, who is the gentleman to whom the Senator has just referred? What is his occupation and business, and what is his connection with this measure?

Mr. COPELAND. His name was used extensively by the Senator from Alabama. He is the attorney of the International Mercantile Marine and of Lykes Bros.

Mr. WALSH. He is opposed to the Senator's proposition?

Mr. COPELAND. No; not to my proposition. The Senator from Alabama makes the great point that he is in favor of my proposition.

Mr. BLACK. He is opposed to my proposition.

Mr. COPELAND. He is opposed to the proposition of the Senator from Alabama, and the Senator reaches the conclusion, therefore, that on this particular matter Mr. Campbell is wrong. He may be on a great many others, but so far as supporting my resolution is concerned, I am with him 100 percent, and my committee unanimously supported me in the position which I am taking and in the presentation of this proposal.

Mr. President, I want a ship-subsidy bill. The Senator from Alabama wants one. And I hope that we may get one before this session shall be concluded. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to serve notice now on the shipowners of America that we need their help and suggestions, but I am not going to be one to help coddle them along indefinitely. I think we ought to have a ship-subsidy bill. I think the President has presented us a fine program; and if the Senator from Alabama will cooperate with us in the Commerce Committee, we will try to bring to the Senate a bill which will be worth while.

I think we have one now which might well be passed at this very minute, but the Senate is not in the mood for that. However, I hope, Mr. President, that there will be no inference indulged that here is a situation where the President should have acted.

Furthermore, so far as I am concerned, while I am not a lawyer, I believe that a number of these contracts are in the public interest, and from what lawyers tell me there are a good many of them which could not possibly be canceled in the manner proposed by the Senator from Alabama, which is pretty crude and pretty cruel.

The question is, are we ready to cut off and to abrogate contracts solemnly entered upon and to shut the door on the 1st day of April and say, "This is the end of American shipping so far as these contracts are concerned." I am not willing to have that done, and I ask the Senate to vote down the substitute of the Senator from Alabama and to permit us to go forward in orderly fashion to bring here a ship-subsidy bill which may be enacted into law.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator a moment ago, as I understood him, made the statement that the joint resolution had the unanimous support of the Commerce Committee. I understand that the joint resolution was reported out yesterday morning, and so far as I know by unanimous vote of those who were present at the committee meeting. I arrived, but the committee meeting had adjourned. I had previously attended a meeting of the Finance Committee. I have no objection to the statement, if it be true, that the joint resolution was reported by the unanimous vote of those who were present, but I certainly would not like the statement to go out that it had the unanimous support of the Commerce Committee, though, so far as I am concerned, I do not ever intend to vote for a ship-subsidy measure.

Mr. COPELAND. I was not talking about the ship-subsidy bill. I was talking about the joint resolution, and I think the Senator from Missouri told me yesterday that he was not particularly opposed to it.

Mr. CLARK. I told the Senator from New York that I was in favor of the substitute of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. COPELAND. Anyway, on the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], seconded by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], the committee, at a largely attended meeting and the most enthusiastic and best meeting of the committee we have had this year, it was voted by every member present to report the joint resolution, and I brought it here by the order of the committee.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am not challenging the statement of the Senator from New York that he had the right to report the joint resolution, and by the unanimous action of the committee members present, but I do not wish it to appear in the RECORD that it had the unanimous support of the members of the Commerce Committee, because I very much prefer the substitute measure of the Senator from Alabama.

There seems to me to be a very essential difference between the joint resolution and the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. In the one case these contracts are perpetuated and continued until April 1, 1936, on which date there will still exist the same situation which exists today, if the shipping interests desire to combine as they have combined in the last 2 weeks to compel any effort to rectify the situation along the line of the President's message. Under the Black proposal, on the contrary, a deadline is set on which these contracts will be wiped out and canceled unless Congress, with the concurrence of the President, shall have seen fit in the meantime to take steps to enact legislation to carry out the purposes of the President's message. And the difference seems to me to be a very essential one.

In the one case the President is left in just as embarrassing a position as he is in now, wherein he either has to cancel the contracts outright and wipe out the mail service, which he holds to be very essential, or he has to permit the present contracts to continue with all the vices which have been pointed out.

In the other case a deadline is set which compels all who are concerned about the perpetuation of the ocean mail service under reasonable conditions to get together and work out legislation to that end. It seems to me there is a very essential difference.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to state that since I spoke a little while ago my attention has been called to the fact, though I have not found the particular section that the United States Code provides, that all mail contracts shall carry a provision that they may be canceled by Congress. In other words, the power is given to Congress to cancel the contracts.

Mr. CLARK. Certainly, nothing is more clear than the fact that the determination of ordinary, honest, fair treatment of the Government and the taxpayers of the United States is the business of Congress. Congress has no right to put the President of the United States in such a situation as is proposed. It is the duty of Congress to determine this as a matter of policy. Congress should exercise its function instead of hiding behind the substitute that the President may have discretion to do whatever he pleases when he has no real discretion.

FRAUDULENT STEAMSHIP CONTRACTS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to compliment my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and my friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] on the stand they have taken in this matter. Unfortunately we cannot get any help from a partisan division in this case. When it is desired to distribute something that is to the financial interest of prominent Democrats, the help of the other side is obtained on partisan grounds. When it is desired to distribute something that is to the interest of a financial set of Republicans, the help of enough Democrats can be obtained to start the ball rolling. Unfortunately this happens to be a case in which my friend from Alabama is bucking a very hard game.

This infamous fraud and scandal, the like of which has never previously existed and for which there is no kind of defense, was conceived and executed under a Republican administration and very aptly continued under a Democratic administration through very clever maneuvering.

I wish to recall to the Senate the 28th day of February 1933, a few days before Mr. Franklin Roosevelt was inaugurated, when it was brought out on the floor of the Senate that these fraudulent contracts were in force, and that methods were then being studied for the purpose of alleviating whatever the condition may have been in order that these frauds might continue under the Democratic administration. Those who are concerned, in order that they may know the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] has not run onto any new matter, may read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 28, 1933, beginning at page 5200 and going to page 5233 et sequitur.

Mr. President, if I may take a little of the time of the Senate, I want to say that a year and 3 or 4 months ago, probably 16 months ago, a gentleman came to my office, who said, "An investigation is being made into the ocean mail situation. There are certain documents which have arrived in envelops and in other portfolios which will not be investigated and will not be considered by the committee for some months yet to come." He said, "I want you to get hold of those documents, if you can, and keep certain ones about which I will tell you, because if they are inserted in the record today, no doubt when they come up for proper investigation there will be other matters to excite the attention of the committee, and they will be very important."

There and then this man outlined to me how this gigantic fraud had been perpetrated. Finally, I said to the man, "What is your name?" He said, "I prefer not to give you my name. I am prominently connected with a department of the United States. I know these facts. I want you to get the facts." I said, "Just a moment. You will have to give me your name. I shall not divulge your name, but I should like to know your name."

He gave me his name. He accompanied me into the special committee room where the committee investigating ocean mail contracts at the time was holding its hearings, or the room next to it. There and then I dug up some of the documents, not all of them but a few, to which the Senator from Alabama has referred this afternoon. There and then I went back and discussed this matter with the man who is yet in the employ of the United States Government. He outlined to me how they had organized this fraud to bilk the United States Government out of millions and millions of dollars, how they were continuing it at that time, and how they were at the proper time going to try to exert such influence that the Black Committee would never bring the matter to the floor of the United States Senate.

I came to the floor of the Senate and made an exposure, such as I could, covering a period of some 3 hours, reading these documents. What did they show? One of them, extracted from a file obtained in Philadelphia, was a memorandum or telegram or letter, I cannot remember just which at this time. Whether it was true or whether it was false, there were extracted from the files certain notes which Mr. Kermit Roosevelt had sent from the Nourmahal while he was temporarily off the Nourmahal, in which he said, "We have the party in hand", or something to that effect.

The committee sent for Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Astor, and they denied having sent that message after it had been offered on the floor of the United States Senate. I think I was the first one publicly to offer it, but I was indebted to the committee for having found the document.

At a later date the whole matter began to stir, as it had been threatening to do, and the final wind-up was that the very persons who had made these contracts for Hoover were continued in authority under the present administration a sufficient length of time to make these things more or less permanent.

What has been developed? This is one of the kind of cases we are going to take to the people of the United States if the Congress does not correct it. This is one of the kind of cases we are going to take, with the letters and the figures, to show that this spearhead of corruption and rottenness and public thievery and crookedness from the ground up has been permitted by both of the parties for the last 6 years. There is not a man living who will take the time to read who can deny that a fraud, a steal, a rampant swindle has been inflicted on the United States Government. It is so damnably crooked, so rotten, so perfidious, that it smells to heaven, and no man can go through the hearings and excuse himself for helping to continue it for a minute.

One of these men put up $500. One of them in on this skin game, this swindle, this fraud, this crooked, rotten outfit that is being continued today and was started under Hoover, put up the magnificent sum of $500 as his part to get the Government's contract. How much did he take out? My recollection is that his profits out of his investment of $500 were $4,900,000. The Government paid him that sum in clear profits above all expenses after having deducted, my recollection is, $2,100,000 for certain items of depreciation and other expenses which were more or less capital assets.

In another case referred to by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] this afternoon Lykes Bros. of Florida were supposed to put up $110,000. They did not put up $110,000. If Senators will investigate the contracts they will find they were not obligated to put up $110,000. But if they did put up $110,000 they drew down $6,250,000 of clear profits from what was supposed to have been an investment of $110,000, though it never was and never could have been an investment of $110,000.

There was also the Roosevelt Steamship Co. The Roosevelt Steamship Co. was a concern owned by Mr. Kermit Roosevelt and by Mr. Franklin, I believe. It was a subsidiary corporation of the International Merchant Marine. They had a contract under which they invested practically nothing. They made profits perhaps not so enormous on their face as the particular companies to which I have just referred, but outlandish profits, nevertheless, on contracts which practically bound them to do nothing, and when we finally got down to what the investment was, we found they had put it up out of the immense subsidies which had been granted to them by the Government.

How were the contracts granted to them? They were granted to them by the most publicly fraudulent activities that could possibly have occurred. They not only were in collusion, they not only admitted the collusion, but they alleged that they had to have collusion; they alleged that they had agreed to bilk and loot the Treasury of the United States Government. The parties and persons and boards through whom they were to go to loot the Treasury of the United States Government were there and then set out and named and determined, and when they finally reached the entire situation and there had to be a change of administration, they saw to it that their activities were approved, and they had retained in office the gentleman at the head of the Shipping Board until this matter could be made permanent and could not be interfered with.

I have no doubt how the joint resolution will be disposed of. I know this matter has not a chance on God's earth to be voted any other way than according to what my friend the Senator from New York has brought here. I know that the Senator from Alabama will fail to win with his substitute resolution, though I am going to vote for it. Nevertheless I know he will fail to win.

Mr. President, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is not in the Chamber at this time. I should like to have him here. I have a proposition to submit. He said the President of the United States wants his resolution and does not want the Black resolution. I want to get that in the RECORD. I make the proposition that he cannot get the President of the United States to send a message or a letter to the Congress that he wants any such thing. I am willing to wager he cannot get it to save his life.

I want the President of the United States to put his name on the dotted line this time. Let us find out if he is for the pending joint resolution. I make the proposition that the Senator from New York cannot get a letter or message sent here by the President of the United States against the Black resolution or in favor of the resolution the Senator from New York is backing.

I want that to be heard by the Senator from New York. I hope someone will recall him to the Chamber. I want him to hear this. He is a very good friend of mine. I am not in the position of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. I am a little bit outside of the breastworks and can talk a bit like I want to, but I would not talk differently anyway.

I make the proposition that the President of the United States will not send anything here stating that he is in favor of the resolution in charge of the Senator from New York. I am a good enough politician to tell the Senate that he is not going to do that. He never has done it. Perhaps I am wrong about it. The Senator from New York said his joint resolution is favored by the President of the United States. It will not make any difference with me whether it is or not. I do not care whether the President favors it or not. I would not vote for it; but I make the proposition that the Senator from New York cannot get the President of the United States to say any such thing. I should like to have the misunderstanding cleared up.

Mr. President, my friend the Senator from New York has just entered the Chamber. As I understood him, replying to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from New York indicated that he was under the impression that his resolution is favored by the President. May I inquire of the Senator from New York if that is his impression?

Mr. COPELAND. It is.

Mr. LONG. Would I be asking too much—and if I am, I shall withdraw my question—if I should inquire just how the Senator gets that idea?

Mr. COPELAND. I think I hardly need be put on the witness stand.

Mr. LONG. I know that. The Senator and I are good friends. I am just a poor man from down in the backwoods of Louisiana. I want to get the situation straight.

I make the suggestion that we hold this matter open until morning. It is now 7 o'clock. If no one else wants to make a speech about it, I suggest that we postpone it until morning. I suggest to my good friend from New York that the President of the United States can wind up this argument by sending a message here that he is in favor of the resolution in charge of the Senator from New York and opposed to the substitute resolution of the Senator from Alabama. I make the proposition to the Senator from New York that the President will not send here any such message as that, nor will he even give the Senator a letter to that effect. I should like to see this tested out.

The Senator from New York takes the position that the President wants his resolution passed. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] takes the position, I think without justification at all, that the attitude of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] reflects upon the attitude of the President. I do not agree with either one of them. I should like to have the President state his position in this matter. There has been much talk about it. We ought to know all about it. I make the assertion that if the situation is presented to Mr. Roosevelt that the United States Senate is waiting for him to say in writing beyond any question of doubt whether he favors this proposition, no one will ever get a line out of him to the Senate of the United States that he is in favor of the Copeland resolution. That is so, if I know what I am talking about. I do not know just what his position is, of course, because the Senator well knows that I am not particularly in the confidence of the President at this time.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say a word. Really, what difference does it make? The question is this:

If we should adopt the joint resolution of the Senator from Alabama, on the 31st of March all the ships which are now being paid for on the installment plan would be on the hands of the Government again, and we would have Government ownership and control, just as we had before. Two or three lines would survive. The United Fruit Line would survive and the Grace Line would survive, and perhaps the I. M. M. would survive; but the great majority of the lines would be gone "up the spout."

In my opinion it does not matter what the President's view is. I have told the Senate what I think it is; but, so far as I am concerned, I am satisfied that if we have any interest in the American merchant marine we have no right to draw a line on the 31st of March, and then say, "On April Fool's Day of 1936 the American merchant marine shall cease to exist."

Mr. LONG. I am going to answer the Senator. The Senator from Alabama stated the matter in language entirely too cultivated for me to understand. I am going to answer what the Senator says, and I am going to show wherein the difference lies. It is in three parts:

First, if the merchant marine of the United States must survive or subsist on a fraud of this kind, it never ought to have been allowed to live one day. Whenever the commonest kind of rascality and thievery and crookedness in negotiation and in carrying out a contract has to support a merchant marine, I would rather that merchant marine should never have breathed its first breath of life.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LONG. Just a minute; let me answer the question.

Mr. COPELAND. I merely wish to make one statement.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. COPELAND. If all these contracts were fraudulent, they should have been canceled long ago.

Mr. LONG. Why, certainly; beyond any question.

Mr. COPELAND. But they are not, and that is where the trouble is. That is where the whole major premise of the Senator falls down, because they are not fraudulent. The great majority of them certainly are above suspicion.

Mr. LONG. Just a moment. When I answer the Senator's question I am going to prove to him that they are fraudulent.

No. 1: If the American merchant marine must survive on fraud and rottenness, it never ought to have existed. We will at least agree on that if my premises shall be proven correct.

No. 2: What is the difference between what has been offered by the Senator from Alabama and what has been offered by the Senator from New York? The joint resolution of the Senator from New York says that these contracts shall continue until, by affirmative action of the President and the Congress, they shall be discontinued. It will take an act of Congress prescribing a new law, and it will take the act of the President discontinuing the present contracts, to break up what is now going on.

The amendment of the Senator from Alabama says that the longest this fraud can go on is until the 1st day of April.

That is the difference between them. The joint resolution of the Senator from Alabama says that whether Congress acts or not, whether the President acts or not, the only forum vested with control over this matter is the Congress of the United States—so much so that in this particular instance it is written into the contract itself that it can even be discontinued by the Congress of the United States; and therefore Congress, having neglected, or if not neglected, having been unable to perform a duty which it long since should have performed, as the Senator from New York well suggests, now says, "We will not permit this fraud to continue beyond the 1st of April 1936." But if we adopt what the Senator from New York proposes, it continues unless a law is passed by Congress, and it continues provided it is not disrupted by the President's action.

That is just what this thing means. Why do you want to pass the joint resolution of the Senator from New York? You do not need to do that. It will continue anyway until the Congress or the President acts. The joint resolution of the Senator from New York is not needed to stop this fraud. That thing is void on its face, ab initio. It was conceived, made, negotiated, and is today executed, in a continuing fraud, without a single earmark of virtue to defend it today. Never has a fraud been allowed to survive or to exist that long which did not have some earmark or some footprint of virtue or public good about it; but this thing has not one.

One hundred thousand dollars pretended to have been invested, for which the Government has paid profits of six and a half million dollars above expenses. Five hundred thousand dollars—no; I made a mistake—$500 invested, and the men give their note to themselves for $499,500, and take the Government's money and pay off their own note, and have $4,900,000 to spare, from an investment of $500—these crooks. I use that word in a complimentary sense, of course, Mr. President. [Laughter.] I do not mean to offend them.

The Senator from New York has gone; but, nonetheless, why are these crooked contracts? If you need any more proof than the fact that for $500 one of them shows up with clear profits of $4,900,000 of the Government's money, not counting $2,100,000 more that was charged off—if you need any more proof than that one fact alone that this was an unquestionably fraudulent transaction on its face, we will give you another proof.

They admit in writing that they had negotiated this contract in order that it might not be subjected to competitive bidding, in order that this kind of a contract might be had. According to their own written admissions, according to their own sworn testimony, this thing was conceived, planned, and executed so that there would not be any chance for an outsider to come in with a competitive bid. That is why $500 was turned into a profit of $4,900,000. That is why a promise to pay $100,000 was turned into profits of $4,900,000.

I have not gone into other things because they might be questioned, but I could tell you how the Roosevelt and Franklin end of this matter was handled; how they dissolved one corporation and organized another; how the Government refused to allow an extension to one man, and cut the debt in half, and allowed the extension to the Franklin International Mercantile Marine and gave them a ship-subsidy contract to boot.

Here was the United Lines—I will add this much to what the Senator from Alabama has read from the record—here was the United Lines that the Government declined to allow an extension of credits; but in the case of the International Mercantile Marine they not only extended the credits but they cut the debt in half; and then, when they failed to perform their contract and were held liable for $2,000,000 for defalcation, the Government wiped that off the record, too, and forgave them that, and then gave them a big ship-subsidy contract on top of that. That is what they did. There is not a line of proof in this record to contradict it when the facts are gone into; and yet this kind of a swindle has been allowed to go on here all these years, and they have managed to manipulate this situation with the influence they have exerted over the departments of the United States Government, so that they said, "We have devoted our intellect and our minds to settling up the differences which have existed interparty and outside of parties and between the parties, and we have thereby managed to keep Admiral Cone at the head of the United States Shipping Board long enough to confirm these contracts that have been negotiated."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator was talking about competitive bidding. I desire to read him about three lines from the minutes of the board which passed on these bids. This was at a committee meeting:

Mr. GLOVER. There is no doubt in my mind that the United Fruit will do the same thing. In other words, they want to get some of this money that is being passed around; they are not particular whether on the Colombian service or their routes to the Canal or any other. If we don't act on their request for advertising some of their routes where they are exclusive operators, they will make an effort to get it; and I think that old man Raymond is wrong—he is taking too much for granted.

Mr. JENKINS. What do you think we should do?

Mr. GLOVER. I think we should advertise the Colombian route. I think that is a line which should be given aid. It is up against foreign competition; it renders real service to us, and I think they are entitled to consideration. We always felt that the United Fruit Co. was wrong in coming in and bidding the way they did.

And then again, a little farther on:

The line has already been certified; and the only way that I see that you can suggest the matter be readvertised so as to give the Colombian Steamship Co. a good chance of getting it, is to have the Shipping Board figure out some way of specifying type, size, speed, etc., to give him a preferred position. What do you think of that?

Mr. JENKINS. That is my idea exactly.

* * * * * * *

Mr. GLOVER. I think that is a good suggestion; I think it is well to word your advertisement so that it might fall into the lap of the Colombian Steamship Co.

And it did, and the pie was passed around.

Mr. LONG. Yes; to be sure.

Mr. BLACK. And the Colombian Co. got that route, and the United Fruit Co. obtained its route.

Mr. LONG. Think of what wonderful men they were. After they took the whole thing, they happened to think of another concern, a big one, it happened to be, and they said, "We ought to let them have a little. We are here, the United States Government", passing around among themselves. "Let your conscience be your guide. Let us let this company in."

"How will you do it?"

He said, "We will fix up the specifications, the speed of the boats, the size of the boats, the length of the service, the route, the color of the cook's hair, so that nobody can get it but this particular company, because we do not want any trouble out of them, and they are likely to yell if we do not cut them a piece of pie," and they did.

Gentlemen of the United States Senate, do you mean to sit here and let that kind of a thing be voted into the law this evening? Do you mean to tell me the President of the United States will come here and say he wants the Senate to continue that kind of a damnable fraud for one more hour? Go get his letter. You will not hear any more from me right now if you do, but you will surely hear from me soon afterward if he will come here and say that.

He will not do it. No; my friend the Senator from New York says now, "What does the attitude of the President matter anyway?" That is all they have been hiding behind all day long. Now they come here at this later hour and say, "What has the position of the President to do with it anyway?" Why have they been hiding behind the President's position all day long if he does not count for anything?

I do not believe that anyone can get the President of the United States to come here for this kind of a fraud. I do not believe he will do it. I believe the Senator from New York has been misinformed. As good as he is and as honorable as he is, he has lately been taken in on this thing.

I was taken in before he was. [Laughter.] They had me. I want to tell you how they lull you to sleep with this supposed to be Americanism.

I was down in New Orleans, La., Governor of the State of Louisiana, when, lo and behold, one day they put a telegram under my nose and said, "Sign here", protesting to the Congress of the United States against this continuing of the Mississippi Shipping Co. subsidy. I signed once, and they brought me something else, and I signed it again. The man who brought it said, "We will pay for the telegram." I said, "No; never mind about that; I will pay for this one, and I will get you some more."

Lo and behold, a few days later, after I came to the Senate, the Senator from Alabama showed me a check, with a letter or something, showing that the same company which had me wiring up here was sending money down there to use against me in my campaign the same year. [Laughter.]

Here I was, wiring for those devils to Washington, those men who were scuttling the President of the United States, and I will be dadgummed if they were not sending Government money down there, just as fast as they got it from the Government, in order to beat me in my election. [Laughter.]

The same thing is probably happening to the Senator from New York right now, and he does not know about it. [Laughter.] He had better think about that a while.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield. I hope I have not offended my friend.

Mr. COPELAND. I just wanted to say that I did not get any Government money to help elect me.

Mr. LONG. The Senator was reading a newspaper, and did not hear what I said. I will ask him to read my remarks tomorrow. I know he did not. I can acquit the Senator of ever having had any help from the Government, either the Democrats or the Republicans. The trouble with him is that he is kind of kinfolk to me in that respect, and that is why I do not like to see him get off wrong now.

He has been right too long to be here championing this kind of a thing, and I am trying to give him the benefit of my experience, and keep him from making a mistake. I did not want to tell what a sucker I had been in this thing. I am frank to tell my colleagues what I did not want to confess to my law clients who were hiring me that I had that little sense; but I did. I am trying to keep someone else from getting into this kind of a tangled mess I got myself into before I came to the United States Senate.

We hear talk about the American merchant marine—"hoist the flag." Every time this combination of scuttlers hoists the flag, away over the Stars and Stripes they put the dollar sign, and underneath that the skull and crossbones, and somewhere they may have the Stars and Stripes hung out just for good measure.

One of these contractors that was supposed to be hoisting the American flag was under contract with the Empire of Great Britain to do nothing that would disturb their majesty on the seas. The very company which has signed a contract to exploit the American merchant marine, the very International Mercantile Marine, was in partnership with the British White Star Line, and signed up under another contract with the British Government that they would do nothing that would take the business of the merchant marine of Great Britain, and that they would in no manner at any time do other than protect the supremacy of the seas for Great Britain. Nonetheless, that is the benevolent concern which signed up and practically engineered the transaction through which the United States Government has been filched out of so many millions of dollars that it is not yet able to find out how much it was.

Let us get down to cases. I say that the President of the United States will not come out for the Copeland measure. I say he will not do it. I am willing to have this matter settled, as it will be settled, on the message of the President, and let us have it. Let us all go on record.

Here is a fraud which the people of the United States have been waiting to see uncovered for a long time, and it has been most masterfully uncovered. The first time I entered the United States Senate, and took my seat back on the rear row, the first vote I cast was for a resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], who was trying to amend some act. I told him today that in statesmanship he had risen many, many points in my estimation on account of the great exposure he has completed here today, when he brought out the fraud of this combination which has practically strangled the party organizations of both the Democratic and the Republican Parties.

Do not fool yourselves; we are going to correct this condition. We may not do it today, but it cannot stand the sunlight. There are certain plants which grow in the shade and there are certain plants which grow in the sunlight. This is one that grows in the dark. It cannot live when exposed to the sunlight. The exposure has been made; this thing has received the kiss of death by this report which has been made here today by the Senator from Alabama.

I hope the Senate will take one of two positions. If it wants to say that it is voting the President's will, let the President send his message here, or if not that, then let the Senate vote to annul something which was conceived in fraud. And I say conceived in fraud deliberately. The Supreme Court has said that whenever there is either collusion or an agreement by which a contract is to be had without competitive bidding, either collusion to control the price of the contract or the effort to prevent it being let by competitive bidding shows fraud, and that a contract let pursuant thereto is void, ab initio, and is void in every stage of the proceedings thereafter. That is the position, without question, under confession, in which we find these contracts.

Mr. President, I would like to ask my friend from New York to postpone this matter until tomorrow morning, until we may hear from the President and ascertain if he would like to have the Copeland measure or the Black measure. I am satisfied he will send a letter here; he frequently does. He will give the Senator from New York a letter tomorrow morning if he wants his measure. If he will, the Senate will not hear anything further from me. Of course, I will not vote for it, but the majority will. Let us either do that or let us vote down this measure and vote the Black proposal up, in which event no one will be done any harm. However, best of all, there will be an element of protection at last thrown around a suffering American public, which has been injured from this fraud and which has had to pay for it most grievously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute for Senate Joint Resolution 175.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, because of absence in the conference on the public utilities bill, I have not heard all the discussion which has taken place here this afternoon, but I think I know enough about the joint resolution of the Senator from New York and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama clearly to understand the situation and the issue presented to the Senate. I do not propose to discuss the ocean-mail contracts, for, in my opinion, they are not in issue here.

Some things have been done under the 1928 act which I would not seek to excuse or condone here or anywhere else. Some of these contracts, in my opinion, are unwise. Some of them are improvident. There has been cupidity on the part of ship operators and there has been stupidity on the part of governmental officials, but I stand here and say to the Senate that these wholesale charges of collusion, of fraud, of illegality are not warranted by the facts.

I stand here and say to the Senate that the man who so believes and votes because of such belief is drawing an indictment against the Department of Justice of the United States; he is drawing an indictment against the President of the United States himself, for during more than 2 years of time the President has had authority to cancel or modify each and every one of these contracts, and every fact which has been brought out by investigation of the Senate committee, by the Post Office Department, or by others, has been available for him during long months of time. If Senators see fit, they may vote such an indictment of their Department of Justice, they may vote such an indictment of the President of the United States, but I shall not do so, for the facts do not justify such action.

Mr. President, what is the real issue before the Senate at this time? There is the resolution of the Senator from New York proposing an extension of the Presidential authority to deal with these contracts. There is the substitute motion of the Senator from Alabama, the proposed legislative cancelation of every single one of these mail contracts. I stand here and dare to assert that there are not three Senators in this body who are able to or who have knowledge intelligently to discuss even three of these contracts. There are not five Senators here who have sufficient knowledge in detail of a half dozen of these mail contracts intelligently to discuss them. Yet we are being asked to vote a wholesale cancelation of each and every one of them. To my mind that is an entirely unwarranted thing to ask of this body. It is an entirely unjustified thing for this body to do.

The resolution of the Senator from New York proposes the extension of the Presidential authority. What is that authority? That authority is not only one of cancelation, but it is an authority of modification. There has been no responsible executive officer of this Government who has recommended cancelation of these contracts. The Comptroller General of the United States at no time has declared them illegal. The Department of Justice of the United States at no time has declared them illegal or made any move toward the cancelation of a single one of them. Even the Post Office Department itself, in its report to the President with respect to all of them, while it recommended modification in many instances, while it recommended modification by the Federal Government to recover moneys which it said had been improperly paid, in no instance, so far as my recollection goes, with possibly two or three exceptions, did it or the Postmaster General himself recommend cancelation of these contracts. Over and over again, however, he did recommend modification, and that is a power which the President has under the resolution of the Senator from New York—modification or cancelation—and that is the orderly way in which to proceed; it is the sensible way in which to proceed; and it is the course of action to which the Senate should give its approval.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama in the nature of a substitute. The yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COPELAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

So Mr. BLACK's amendment, in the nature of a substitute, was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment, the question now recurs on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution, but before doing so I wish to state again that, in my judgment, which is backed by information I received too late to make the statement before the last vote was cast, so far as there being any authority for the statement that the President favors the resolution of the Senator from New York as opposed to the substitute offered by me, I do not believe it to be true.

Now, I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution, and I wish to make a further statement.

Mr. COPELAND. Just a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the demand for the yeas and nays sustained?

The yeas and nays were ordered

Mr. COPELAND. Did the Senator say that the statement I made was untrue?

Mr. BLACK. I stated that, in my judgment, the statement that the President favors the joint resolution of the Senator from New York over the substitute offered by me is not true.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well. I say that the Secretary of Commerce told me today that this day the President said he wanted to have the continuing joint resolution passed.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to occupy about a minute further. The Senate is about to vote on whether or not the time for canceling these contracts shall be extended from October until next April. Those who vote "yea" vote to extend those contracts; those who vote "nay" vote in favor of seeing, if possible, that the contracts, each one of them, which the Postmaster General has reported on as being illegal and not justified, shall be canceled.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Will the contracts become void in October if no action shall be taken on them?

Mr. BLACK. In my judgment, they are void now, and the Comptroller General should stop payments from being made; but if there should be no action now, the President would be given from now until October to act on the contracts.

Mr. WALSH. If he should not act in October, what would become of the contracts?

Mr. BLACK. The contracts would still be there. It is a question of whether they are void on account of being fraudulent, and being paid even though they are void, or whether they shall simply continue as they are.

Mr. WALSH. As I understand the question, the Senator says that even if we should vote down this joint resolution the President would have discretionary power to cancel the contracts between now and October.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. And if we should vote for it, he would have discretionary power until next April?

Mr. BLACK. That is perfectly true.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator answer a question? Does the joint resolution of the Senator from New York cancel the contracts on the 1st of next April, or does it merely authorize the President, in his discretion, to extend them until the 1st of next April?

Mr. BLACK. It authorizes the President, in his discretion, to cancel them at any time between now and next April.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama what the effect upon the contracts would be, according to the evidence before his committee, if no action should be taken toward the cancelation of the contracts under the authority of the Independent Offices Act, as extended by this joint resolution?

Mr. BLACK. If no action should be taken?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me state my question again.

The joint resolution proposes to extend until the 30th of April 1936 the power of the President to cancel the contracts. Am I correct?

Mr. BLACK. Under certain terms and conditions contained in that act.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, let me answer the Senator's question, if I may. The President will have until the 30th of April 1936 what he now has.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Exactly. That is my understanding. Now, the question is, if he does not exercise that authority, what becomes of the contracts?

Mr. COPELAND. They are continued in force.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The contracts then are continued in force?

Mr. COPELAND. As they would be now. The President, at any time during the past year, could have acted upon these contracts.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is my understanding, not being a member of the Committee on Commerce, that there have been considerable negotiations looking toward the introduction of a bill satisfactory to the executive departments for a ship subsidy. Is that correct?

Mr. COPELAND. That is true.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. And that no satisfactory bill has been prepared.

Mr. COPELAND. That is true.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Is the joint resolution still open to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is open to amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I move to amend the joint resolution by striking out "April 30" and substituting in lieu thereof "March 1"; the purpose of that amendment being to shorten the time so that the Congress, after assembling in January, may have the opportunity, if necessary, to act in a legislative manner upon this subject.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will fix the date as April 1, I think I should be satisfied to accept the amendment. With the pressure of things in January, when we must consider the bonus bill and some other matters, and in view of the fact that this is a very controversial question, I doubt if we could prepare a bill in the less than 2 months we should have between the convening of Congress and the 1st of March. I shall be perfectly satisfied if the Senator wishes to make it the 1st of April.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Then I offer as the date March 31, 1936.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, line 5, it is proposed to strike out "April 30, 1936" and insert "March 31, 1936."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment: I move to strike out the period in line 5, and in lieu thereof to insert a colon and the following words:

Provided, That the right of the United States to annul any fraudulent or illegal contract, or to institute suit to recover sums paid thereon, is in no manner affected by this act.

Mr. COPELAND. I am happy to accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York indicates his readiness to accept the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The Official Reporter read as follows:

Provided, That the right of the United States to annul any fraudulent or illegal contract, or to institute suit to recover sums paid thereon, is in no manner affected by this act.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York whether that is not already included in the joint resolution anyway?

Mr. COPELAND. I should say common sense tells us that that is included.

Mr. HARRISON. What effect will that amendment have upon the joint resolution?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not believe it will have any effect; but, if it pleases my friend to add it to the joint resolution, I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass? On that question the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered. As many as favor the passage of the joint resolution will vote "yea." Those opposed will vote "nay." The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BULKLEY (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement of my general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], and not knowing how he would vote, I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. NYE (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay." If the Senator from Virginia were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Utah (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The present occupant of the chair announces that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DONAHEY], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily detained.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] has a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL].

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY];

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]; and

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] with the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO].

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], if present, would vote "yea"; and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], if present, would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 20, as follows:

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in a moment or two I wish to bring up the flood-control bill. Previous to that I ask unanimous consent to have the bill regarding false billing, to which the Senator from Tennessee objected this morning, considered by the Senate, as he has withdrawn his objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the clerk will state by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill (S. 3467) to amend the Shipping Act of 1916, as amended.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, it will be recalled that several hours ago, in response to the suggestion of the able leader of the Democratic side, I consented to lay aside a motion which was pending before the Senate to take up the bill giving authority to the War Department to accept a site for an Air Corps school at Denver. It is not my desire to yield a place at this time for another matter. I therefore desire to know whether the request now made is going to take any time.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, let me say that I ask that the pending business be laid aside. I think it will take no time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado whether he expects to seek to have recognition accorded him to move to take up the bill referred to in advance of the consideration of the deficiency bill?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, it has been my hope that I might take the floor and yield for the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has submitted a unanimous-consent request. Is there objection?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Under the circumstances, Mr. President, I am constrained to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.
